(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is vncertaine, though it may be ſuſpected: but ſure it is; he now gone, the Duke of Buckingham twice ſollicited Gloucester by his meſſengers in the North, met him at Northampton himſelfe, accompanied him to London, forwarded him in Counſell, and was the firſt Actor in this following tragedy. For, firſt making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, diſabling the young King, baſtardizing them both, perſwading the Citizens, working the Nobility: and all this done, to ſet the Crowne vpon crookt Richards head, and ſo moulded their minds vnto the man, as they all became humble petitioners vnto him for to accept of the ſame; who in the meane while had well conned his owne part, by profuſe liberalitie, by paſſing great grauity, by ſingular affability, by miniſtring of iuſtice, and by deepe and cloſe deuiſes, whereby hee wonne to himſelfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers eſpecially, to ſerue beſt his turn, which was ſo affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and preſented him to accept the wearing of the Crown: the true copy wherof as we find it recorded in the Parliament Rol, we haue inſerted, & is as followeth.

In Rotulo Parliamenti tenti apud Weſtm. die Veneris Viceſimo tertio die Ianuarii, An. Regni Regis Richardi 3. primo inter alia continetur vt ſequitur.

Memorandum quod quadam billa exhibita fuit coram Domino Rege in Parliamento predicto in hac verba: Where late heretofore, that is to ſay, before the conſecration, coronation, and inthronization of our ſoueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenor vnderwritten on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Eſtates of this Realme of England, that is to witte, of the Lords Spirituall & Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and diuers Lords Spirituall and Temporall; and other Nobles and notable perſons of the Commons in great multitude was preſented and actually deliuered vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord, the intent and effect expreſſed at large in the ſame roll: to the which Roll, and to the conſiderations, and inſtant petition compriſed in the ſame, our ſaid Soueraigne Lord for the publike weale and tranquility of this land benignely aſſented. Now foraſmuch as neither the ſaid three Eſtates, neither the ſaid perſons which in their name preſented, and deliuered as it is aforeſaid, the ſaid Roll vnto our ſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, were aſſembled in forme of Parliament: by reaſon whereof diuers doubts, queſtions, and ambiguities beene moued, and engendred in the minds of diuers perſons, as it is ſaid: Therefore to the perpetuall memory of the truth, and declaration of the ſame, be it ordained, prouided, and eſtabliſhed in this preſent Parliament, that the Tenor of the ſaid roll, with all the contents of the ſame, preſented as is abouesaid, and deliuered to our foreſaid Soueraigne Lord the King, in the name and in the behalfe of the ſaid three Eſtates out of Parliament, now by the ſame three Eſtates aſſembled in this preſent Parliament, and by authority of the ſame bee ratified, enrolled, recorded, approued, and authorized into remouing the occaſions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawfull effects that ſhall now thereof enſue: So that all things ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired and remembred in the ſaid rol, & in the tenor of the ſame vnderwrittē in the name of the ſaid 3. Eſtates, to the effect expreſſed in the ſame roll be of the like effect, vertue & force, as if al the ſame things had bin ſo ſaid, affirmed, ſpecified, deſired & remembred in a full Parliament, and by authority of the ſame accepted & approued. The Tenor of the ſaid Roll of parchment, wherof aboue is made mention, followeth, & is ſuch.

To the high and Mighty Prince
Richard Duke of Gloceſter.

Pleaſe it your noble Grace to vnderſtand the conſiderations, election and petition vnderwritten of vs, the Lords Spirituall & temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and thereunto agreably to giue your aſſent to the common and publike weale of this land, to the comfort and gladneſſe of all the people of the ſame. Firſt, we conſider how that heretofore in time paſſed, this land many yeers ſtood in great proſperity, honour, and tranquilitie; which was cauſed, forſomuch as the King then raigning, vſed and followed the aduiſe and counſell of certaine Lords ſpirituall and temporall, and other perſons of approued ſadneſſe, prudence, policy, & experience, dreading God, and hauing tender zeale and affection to indifferent miniſtration of iuſtice, and to the common and publike weale of the land: Then our Lord God was dread, loued and honoured, then within the land was peace and tranquility, and among neighbours concord and charity, then the malice of outward enemies was mightilie reſiſted and repreſſed, and the land honourably defended with many great and glorious victories, then the entercourſe of Merchants was largely vſed and exerciſed: by which thinges aboue remembred, the land was greatly enriched, ſo that aſwell the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people labouring for their liuings in diuers occupations, had competent gaine to the ſuſtentation of them & their houſholds, liuing without miſerable and intollerable pouerty: but afterward, when that ſuch as had the rule and gouernance of this land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by ſenſuality and concupiſcence, followed the counſell of perſons inſolent, vicious, and of inordinate auarice, deſpiſing the counſell of good, vertuous, & prudent perſons, ſuch as aboue bee remembred; The proſperity of this land dayly decreaſed, ſo that felicity was turned into miſery, and proſperity into aduerſity, and the order of policy, and of the law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreme miſery and deſolation (which God defend) without due prouiſion of couenable remedy bee had in this behalfe, in all goodly haſt.

(3) Ouer this, among other things more ſpeciall wee conſider, how that the time of the raigne of K. Edward the fourth late deceaſed, after the vngracious pretenſed marriage (as all England hath cauſe ſo to ſay) made betwixt the ſaid King Edward, and Elizabeth ſometimes wife to Sir Iohn Gray knight, late naming her ſelfe, and many yeeres heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politicke rule was peruerted, the lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and alſo the lawes of nature, and of England, and alſo of the laudable cuſtomes and liberties of the ſame, wherein euery Engliſh man is inheritor, broken, ſubuerted and contemned, againſt all reaſon and iuſtice, ſo that the land was ruled by ſelfe-will and pleaſure, feare and dread, all manner of equity and law laide apart and deſpiſed, whereof enſued many inconueniences and miſchiefes, as murthers, extortions, and oppreſſions, namely of poore and impotent people, ſo that no man ſure of his life, land or liuelyhood, ne of his wife, daughter nor ſeruant, euery good maiden and woman ſtanding in dread to bee rauiſhed and defloured: and beſides this, what diſcords, inward battels, effuſion of Chriſtian mens bloud, and namely, by the deſtruction of the Nobles bloud of this land, was had and committed within the ſame, it is euident and notarie through all this Realme, vnto the great ſorrow and heauineſſe of all true Engliſhmen. And here alſo wee conſider, how that the ſaid pretended marriage betwixt the aboue named King Edward and Elizabeth Gray was made of great preſumption without the knowing & aſſent of the Lords of this land, and alſo by ſorcery and witchcraft committed by the ſaid Elizabeth and her mother Iaquet Dutcheſſe of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is through all this land: and hereafter if the cauſe ſhall require, ſhall be proued sufficiently in time and place conuenient. And here also wee consider how that the said pretensed marriage was made priuily and secretly without edition of banes in a priuate Chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church after the law of Gods Church, but contrary thereunto, and the laudable custome of the Church of England. And how also that at the time of contract of the same pretended marriage, and before and long time after the said King Edward was and stood married, and troth-plight to one Dame Elienor Butler daughter of the old Earle of Shrewsbury with whom the same Edward had made a precontract of Matrimonie long time before hee made the saide pretenced marriage with the said Elizabeth Gray, in manner and forme aforesaid: which Premisses being true, as in very truth they beene true: it appeareth, and followeth euidently, that the said King Edward during his life, and the said Elizabeth liued together sinfully and damnably in adultery against the law of God and of his Church: And therefore no maruell that the Soueraigne Lord, and the head of this land being of such vngodly disposition, and prouoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; such hainous mischiefe and inconueniences as are aboue remembred, were vsed and committed in the Realme among the Subiects. Also it appeareth euidently and followeth, that all the Issue and children of the said King Edward, beene bastard and vnable to inherite, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the law and custome of England.

(4) Moreouer, we consider how that afterwards by the three Estates of this Realm assembled in Parliament, holden at Westminster the 17. yeere of the raigne of the said King Edward the fourth, hee then being in possession of the Crowne and royall estate, by Act made in the same Parliament, George Duke of Clarence brother to the said King Edward now deceased, was conuicted and attainted of high treason, as in the same Act is contained more at large, by cause and reason whereof, all the Issue of the saide George, was and is disabled and barred of all right and claime that in any case they might haue or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity royall of this Realme, by the ancient law and custome of this same Realme.

George Duke of Clarence and his heires made vncapable of the crowne.

Ouer this wee consider that ye be the vndoubted sonne and heire of Richard late Duke of Yorke, very inheritor of the sayd Crowne and dignitie royall; and as in right King of England by way of inheritance: and that at this time the premisses duely considered there is none other person liuing, but ye only that by right may claime the said Crowne and dignitie royall by way of inheritance, and how that yee be borne within this land; by reason whereof, as we deeme in our mindes, yee be more naturally enclined to the prosperitie and common weale of the same: and all the three estates of the Land haue and may haue more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforesaid. We consider also the great wit, prudence, iustice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in diuers battels, which as wee by experience know you heretofore haue done, for the saluation and defence of this same Realme; and also the great nobleneſſe & excellencie of your birth and bloud, as of him that is descended of the three most royall houses in Christendome: that is to say, England, France and Spaine. Wherefore these premisses by vs diligently considered, we desiring effectually the peace, traquilitie and weale-publique of this Land, and the reduction of the same to the ancient honourable estate and prosperitie, and hauing in your great prudence, iustice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, singular confidence, haue chosen in all that in vs is, and by this our writing choose you High and Mightie Prince our King and Soueraigne Lord, &c. To whom we know for certaine it appertaineth of enheritance to to bee chosen. And hereupon wee humbly desire, pray, and require your most noble Grace, that according to this electiō of vs the three estates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take vpon you the sayd Crowne and royall dignitie, with all things thereunto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging aswell by inheritance as by lawfull election: and in case yee so doe, we promise to serue and assist your Highnesse, as true and faithfull subiects, and liege men; and to liue and die with you in this matter, and in euery other iust quarrel. For certainlie, we be determined rather to aduenture & commit vs to the perill of our liues, and ieopardie of death, then to liue in such thraldom and bondage as wee haue liued long time heretofore oppressed and iniured by extortions and newe impositions against the Law of God and man, and the libertie, old pollicie and Lawes of this Realme, wherein euery Englishman is inherited. Our Lord God, King of all Kings, by whose infinite goodnesse and eternall prouidence all things beene principally gouerned in this world; lighten your soule, and grant you grace to doe aswell in this matter as in all other, that may bee according to his will and pleasure, and to the common and publike weale of this Land: so that after great clouds, trouble, stormes, and tempests, the Sun of Iustice and of Grace may shine vpon vs, to the comfort and gladnesse of all true-hearted Englishmen. Albeit, that the right, title, & estate, which our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne, and roiall dignitie of this Realme of England; with all things thereunto within the same Realme, and without it vnited, annexed & appertaining, bin iust and lawfull as grounded vpon the lawes of God and of nature: and also vpon the ancient lawes and laudable customes of this said Realme; and so taken and reputed by all such persons as beene learned in the aboue said lawes and customes: Yet neuertheless, for asmuch as it is considered, that the most part of the people is not sufficiently learned in the aboue said Lawes and customs, wherby the truth & right in this behalfe of likelyhood may be hid and not cleerely knowne to all the people, & thereupon put in doubt and question. And ouer this, how that the Court of Parliament is of such authoritie, and the people of this Land of such a nature and disposition, as experience teacheth that manifestation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, and by the authority of the same maketh before all other things most feith and certaine, and quieting of mens minds, remoueth the occasion of all doubts, and seditious language. Therefore at the request, and by the assent of the three estates of this Realme; that is to say, the Lords spirituall and temporall, and Commons of this Land assembled in this present Parliament, by authority of the same be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our said Soueraign Lord the King was, and is the very vndoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereunto within the same Realm, and without it vnited, annexed, and appertaining aswell by right of Consanguinity, and inheritance, as by lawfull election, consecration, and coronation. And ouer this, that at the request, and by the assent and authority aboue saide, be it ordained, enacted and established, that the said Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme, and the inheritance of the same, and all other things thereunto within the Realme or without, is vnited, annexed, and now appertaining, rest and abide in the person of our said Soueraigne Lord the King during his life, and after his decease, in his heires of his body begotten; and in especiall at the request, and by assent and authority aboue said, bee it ordained, enacted, established, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, son of our said Soueraigne Lord the King, bee heire apparant of the same our Soueraigne Lord the King to succeed to him in the aboue said Crowne and royall dignity,

(5) These things I haue laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may vnderstand both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward shew of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning hope, pensiue feare, desire of change, and goodly pretences are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdome, euen against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true that a liuing dogge is better then a dead Lyon. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to haue been a Soueraigne, had he not beene a Soueraign as Galba was reputed; who, when he was a Soueraigne, deceiued all mens expectation; but most worthy indeede of Soueraignty, had hee not beene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewde practises, and by mischieuous means, made foule way thereunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeed King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to haue beene.

(6) The Crown and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard vpon the twentie fifth of June, went in great pompe vnto Westminster hall, and there in the Kings Bench Court tooke his Seat, saying, that he would take vpon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefest duety was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration so tickled the eares of his Auditors, that hee lulled the rurall to thinke that his like had neuer raigned in England; and to beginne himselfe with a pretenced clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation whereof, hee sent for one Fogge whom he deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people with semblance accordingly, tooke him by the hand saying, that hee would bee thence forth his assured in affection; whereat the Commons greatly reioyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them tooke it to bee but fained to serue his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoeuer hee met, hee saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to bee guiltie, is in a manner deiected to a seruile flattery.

(7) King Richard whose guilty heart was full of suspition, had sent for fiue thousand Souldiers out of the North to bee present in London at his Coronation; these vnder the leading of Robin of Ridsdale, came vp both euill apparrelled, and worse harnessed, in rusty Armour, neither defencible for proofe, nor scowred for shew: who mustering in Finesburie Fields, were with disdaine gazed vpon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards prouision was conferred vpon his) vpon the fourth of Iuly, he with his wife by water came to the Tower, where he created Estates, ordained the Knights of the Bathe, set at liberty the Archbishoppe of Yorke, and the Lord Stanley, more for feare then for loue; whose sonne the Lord Strange was then said to be gathering of men in Lancashire, where those Lords haue great command.

A.D. 1483. States created by K. Richard.

(8) But Morton Bishop of Ely a firme man vnto King Edward, and vnpossible to bee drawn vnto the disinheriting of his children, as was well perceiued by the Protector, among others, at the Councell held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but vnlikely treasons. This man borne in Dorsetshire, and brought vp in the Vniuersity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Arches made a priuy Councellour vnto King Henry, and after his death allured by King Edward to serue him, was sworne likewise of his Councell, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designes, the Protector much feared, and therefore hauing him fast, minded so to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reuerence of the man, or vndeseruednesse of his wrongs, moued so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the King (who professed much loue to that Vniuersitie) a petitory latine Epistle, no lesse eloquent & pithy, then circumspect and wary, wherein they thus pleaded for his liberty.

(10) King Richard, after this, intending some easier restraint, though not liberty vnto the Bishop, was content to release him out of the Tower, and committed him to the custody of Henry Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brecknocke in Wales, there safely to be kept, vntil himselfe should come thither.

Bishop Morton committed to the custody of the Duke of Buckingham.

(11) The next day with great pompe, state and attendance of the Nobility, the King rode through London, so as a more royall had not beene seene at any Kings Coronation, for there attended him, three Dukes, nine Earles, two Vicounts, twenty Lords, seauenty eight Knights, all of them most richly furnished, whereof the Duke of Buckingham so farre exceeded, that the caparison of his horse was so charged with embroydered worke of gold, as it was born vp from the ground by certaine his footemen thereto appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet continue the most honorable offices performed at his roiall enthroning with no little Admiration, how these Lords assembled to set the Crowne vpon the young Princes head, were so suddainly carried to Crowne his Protector, and that vpon such false and slanderous pretences, as euery one of them saw his title to be meerely an vniust vsurpation, but in them may be seene, that we are all the sonnes of Adam, and in times of extremities, foreslow all publike regard, as ouermuch fearing our priuate and present estate.

(12) Vpon the sixt of Iuly, King Richard with Queene Anne his wife set forth from White-hall towards Westminster, roially attended, and went into the Kings bench in the great hall, from whence himselfe and Queen vpon ray Cloth, both of them barefooted, went vnto King Edwards shrine in Saint Peters Church, all the Nobility going with him in their degree, the trumpets and Heraulds marshalling the way, the Crosse with a solemne procession followed, the Priests in fine surplesses and gray Amysses vpon them, the Bishops and Abbots in rich Copes all of them mytred, and carrying their Crosses in their hands; next came the Earle of Huntington bearing a paire of gilt spurres, signifying Knighthood; after whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint Edwards staffe for a Relique, then followed the Earle of Northumberland with a naked pointles sword in his hand betokening mercy, next whom the Lord Stabley bare the Mace of the Constableship, vpon whose right hand the Earle of Kent bare a naked pointed sword, and on his left hand the Lord Louell the like naked pointed sword, the former signifying Iustice towards the temporalty, & the other Iustice to the Clergy; the Duke of Suffolke then followed with the Scepter, which signified Peace: the Earle of Lincolne bare the Ball and Crosse which signified a Monarchy: Then came the Earle of Surrey bearing the fourth sword sheathed in a rich scaberd, and is called the sword of Estate, next whom followed Gartar King at Armes, vpon whose right hand went the Gentleman Vsher of the Kings priuy Chamber, and on his left the Lord Maior of London, with a Mace in his hand; Next vnto whom went the Duke of Norfolke bearing the Kings Crowne betwixt his hands, and then King Richard himselfe came, in a Surcote and Robe of purple veluet; hauing ouer his head a Canapie borne by the foure Barons of the fiue Ports, the Bishop of Bath on his right hand, and of Durham on his left. The Duke of Buckingham bare the Kings traine, and to signifie the office of high Steward of England, he bare a White Staffe in his hand.

(13) Then followed the Queenes traine: before whom was borne the Scepter, the Iuorie Rod with the Doue, and the Crowne; her selfe apparelled in Robes like the Kings vnder a rich Canapie, at euery corner thereof a bell of gold. On her head shee ware a circlet set full of precious stones, the Counteesse of Richmond bearing her traine; the Dutchesse of Norfolke and Suffolk in their Coronets attendants, with twenty Ladies of estate most richly attired. In this order they passed the Pallace into the Abbey, and ascending to the high Altar there shifted their Robes, and hauing other Robes open in diuers places from the middle vpward, were both of them annointed and Crowned, he with Saint Edwards Crowne, hauing the Scepter deliuered into his left hand, and the Ball with the Crosse a token of Monarchie in his right, the Queene had a Scepter giuen into her right hand, and the Iuory Doue in her left; then after the Sacrament receiued (hauing the host deuided betwixt them) they both offered at Saint Edwards shrine, where the King left his Crowne and put on his owne; and thus done, in the same Order and State as they came, returned to Westminster hall, and there held a most Princely feast. Whereof let Hall and Graston tell you for me.

(14) But this his faire Sunne was soone ouercast with many darke Cloudes and mischiefes, which fell thicke vpon the necke of each other, for as the thing euill gotten, is neuer well kept: through all the time of his raigne there neuer ceased death and slaughter, till his owne destruction ended it. Yet as he finished his daies with the best death, and the most righteous, that is to say, his owne: so began he with the most piteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent Nephewes, the young King and his tender brother; whose deaths and finall misfortunes haue neuertheless come so farre in question, that some remaine yet in doubt, whether they were in his daies destroied or no. Not for that only, that Perkin Warbecke by the malice of many, and the folly of more, so long a time abusing the world, was aswel with Princes, as the other poore people, reputed and taken for the younger of these two: but for that also as all things were in late daies so couertly demeaned, one thing pretended and another done, that there was nothing so plaine and openly proued, but for the common custome and close couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly in suspect, as many well counterfeit Iewels make the true mistrusted. Howbeit concerning the opinion with the occasions mouing either party, we shall haue place more at large hereafter to intreat of: in the meane time for this present matter shall be rehearsed the dolorous end of these young Babes, not after euerie report I haue heard, but by such men, and by such meanes, as to my seeming it were hard but it should be true saith Sir Thomas Moore.

Doubts m the two P deaths.

(15) K. Richard presently after his mockish Electiō & glorious Coronation, made his progresse towards Gloucester, to shew (as was thought) in that City his new Kingly estate, which first had vouchsafed him his old honour in bearing her Title; or else, and that rather, to besequestred from other busines, the better to attend that, vpon which his thoughts most busily ranne.

ranne. For albeit the Barke of his begunne aduentures, had without perill well passed the straightes, and now got sea-roome to spread saile at will; yet being vnder gale, and at fortunes disposse, he feared the gust of euery wind: at leastwise suspected that his young Nephewes liuing would stay the course of his deepe reaches, as doth the little fish Remora, who holdeth (as at Anchor) the biggest shippe vnder saile. His inward study therefore still forged, howsoeuer his outward countenance was carried to cleare his passage by taking those dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nephewes enioying their liues, men would be medling with their downe cast cause, and account him an vsurper without all right to the Realme. To stop which streame, no other course could hee find, but to cut off the current by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kinsmen could better his bad claime, or vnkindly murther make him a kindly King. But being resolued, he forthwith sent one Iohn Greene, a seruant in especiall trust vnto Sir Robert Brakenbury Constable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the same Sir Robert should in any wise put the two children to death.

(16) This Greene thus posted to London, deliuered his errand vnto Brakenbury, whom hee found kneeling at his Orizons before the Image of our Lady in the Tower, the businesse being of such weight as the King must bee serued before hee had ended with his Saint. The Constable reading the letter, and perceiuing the bloudy intent of the King, answered plainly, he wold neuer put those innocent babes vnto death, to die therefore himselfe. With which answere Iohn Greene returning, recounted the same to King Richard being at Warwicke, yet in his way to Glocester, wherewith he was maruellously perplexed, and thereat tooke such displeasure, that the same night hee said to a secret Page of his: Ah whom shall a man trust? those that I haue brought vp my selfe, those that I had weened would most surely serue me, euen those faile me, and at my commandement will do nothing. Sir quoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallet without, that I dare well say, to doe your Grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that hee would refuse; meaning this by Sir Iames Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly personage, and for Natures gifts worthy to haue serued a much better Prince, if he had well serued God, and by grace obtained as much truth and good will, as hee had strength and wit.

(17) The man had an high heart, and sore longed vpward, not rising yet so fast as hee hoped, being hindred and kept vnder by the meanes of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who longing for no more partners of the Princes fauour, and namely, not for him, whose pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by secret drifts out of all secret trust, which thing this Page had well marked and knowne: wherefore this occasion offered of very speciall friendshippe, hee tooke his time to put him forward, and by such wise to doe him good, that all the enemies he had, except the Diuell himselfe could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this Pages words, K. Richard arose (for this communication had hee sitting at the draught, a conuenient Carpet for such a Counsell) and came out into a Pallet-Chamber, where hee found in bed, Sir Iames and Sir Thomas Tirrels, of persons much like, and brethren in bloud, but nothing of kin in conditions: Then said the King merrily to them, what Sirs, bee ye in bed so soone? and calling vp Sir Iames, brake to him secretly his mind in this mischieuous matter, in which hee found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morrow hee sent him to Brakenbury with a letter, by which hee was commanded to deliuer Sir Iames all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end hee might accomplish there the Kings pleasure in such things as hee had giuen him in commandement. After which letter deliuered, and the keyes receiued, Sir Iames appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, deuising before and preparing the meanes.

(18) The Prince in the Tower slenderly attended, and altogether neglected by the Nobility, lastly, had newes that his vncle had left the name of Protector, and taken vpon him the Title of King, who with full consent of the Lords was to be crowned within a few daies following, with the same Crowne, and in the like estate as had beene prouided for his solemnity, whereat the deiected Innocent sighed and said; Alasse, I would my vncle would let mee enioy my life yet, though I loose both my Kingdome and Crowne. Which words hee pronounced with such a feeling feare, as much moued the Relater to pitty, and to perswade him with the best comforts hee could: but forthwith the Prince and his brother were both shut vp, and all attendants remoued from them, onely one called Black-will, or William Slaughter excepted, who was set to serue them, and see them sure. After which time the Prince neuer tied his points, nor cared for himselfe, but with that young Babe his brother lingered with thought and heauines, till their traiterous deaths deliuered them out of that wretchednesse: for the execution whereof, Tirrell appointed Miles Forrest, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow fleshed in murther before time. To whom hee ioined one Iohn Dighton his horsekeeper, a bigge, broad, square knaue.

(19) About midnight (al others being remoued from them,) this Miles Forrest, and Iohn Dighton, came into the Chamber, and suddenly wrapped vp the seely children in the Bed-clothes, where they lay keeping by force the feather-bed and pillowes hard vpon their mouthes that they were therein smothered to death, & gaue vp to God their innocent soules into the ioies of heauen, leauing their bodies vnto the Tormentors dead in the bed: which after these monstrous wretches perceiued, first by the strugling with the paines of death, and after long lying still to be thorowly dispatched, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and then fetched Sir Iames their instigator to see them, who caused these murtherers to bury them at the staires foot, somewhat deepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of stones. Then rode Sir Iames in haste to the King, vnto whom he shewed the maner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was so welcome to his wicked heart, as he greatly reioiced, and with great thankes dubbed (as some hold) this his merciles Instrument, knight. But the place of their buriall hee liked not, saying, that vile corner should not containe the bodies of those Princes, his Nephewes, & commanded them a better place for burial, because they were the sons of a King. Whereupon the Priest of the Tower tooke vp the bodies; and secretly interred them in such place, which by the occasion of his death could neuer since come to light.

(20) The continuer of Iohn Harding tels vs from the report of others, that King Richard caused Sir Robert Brakenburies Priest to close their dead corps in lead, and so to put them in a coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two hookes of iron, and so to cast them into a place called the Blacke-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they should neuer rise vp, or be any more seene. Whersoeuer they were buried, thus they died, and by these murtherers. For very certaine it is, and wel knowne, that at such time, as Sir Iames Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treason committed against King Henrie the seuenth, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confessed the murther in manner as is said, but whether their bodies were remoued they could not say. And thus as I haue learned of them that knew much, and little cause had to lie, were these two noble Princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most roial blood, brought vp in great wealth, likely to haue liued, to haue raigned, and ruled in the Realme, by traiterous tyranny taken, deprined of their estates, shortly shut Gods iustice and reuenge vpon the murtherers.

(20) For first to beginne with the Ministers, Miles Forrest at S. Martins, peece-meale rotted away; Sir Iames Tyrrell died at Tower hill for treason. Dighton indeed walketh on aliue in good possibility to be hanged ere he die, liuing at Calis no lesse distained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himselfe as ye shall hereafter heare, was slaine in the field, hacked and hewed of his enemies hands, carried on horsebacke dead, his haire in despite torne and tugged like a Curre dogge: and the mischiefe that he tooke was within lesse then three yeeres of the mischiefe that he did, and yet all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his minde: he neuer thought himselfe sure: but where he went abroad, his eies euer-whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer on his dagger, his countenance & manner like one alwaies readie to strike againe, he tooke il rest a nights, lay long waking and musing, sore wearied with care and watch, rather slumbred then slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, suddainly sometimes start vp, leapt out of his Bed, and ranne about the chamber, so was his restlesse heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and stormy remembrance of his abhominable deed. Neither had he in his best, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conspiracy (or rather good consideration) betweene the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other Gentlemen against him.

Outward enemies arise against King Richard.

(21) Which Duke assoone as Gloucester vpon the death of King Edward came to Yorke, sent thitl r in secret wise a trusty seruant of his, named Persall, to assure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite vpon him with a thousand good-fellowes: and againe sent offers of the like vnto Nottingham, whither the Protector from Yorke, with many Gentlemen of the North Countrey was come, and on his way to London-ward in secret manner met him himselfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horse: and from thence still continued with him, being a partner of all his deuises, till that after his coronation they departed (as it seemed) very great friends at Gloucester: frō whence as soone as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance is of diuers men, diuersely reported; Some haue said, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of Hertfords Lands, to the which he pretended himselfe iust inheritor. And forasmuch as the Title which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before depriued, the Protector conceiued such indignation, that he reiected the Dukes request, with many spightfull and minatory wordes, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke aright on King Richard, but euer feared his owne life, so farre forth, that when the Protector rode through London towards his Coronation, he fained himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him: And the other taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an euill will, and that notwithstanding on the morrow rose from the Feast, faining himselfe sick, whereat King Richard said, it was done in hatred and despite of him. And they say, that euer after continually each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, as the Duke verily looked to haue beene murdered at Gloucester: from which neuertheless he in faire manner departed. But surely some right secret at this day denie this: and many right wise men thinke it vnlikely (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood, if he fell once in suspition of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would giue the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any such conceiued opinion, he would neuer haue suffered the Duke to haue escaped his hands.

The forward affection of the Duke of Buckingham towards the Duke of Gloucester.

The Duke of Buckingham fals in dislike of king Richard.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was an high minded man, and could euill beare the glory of another; so that I haue heard of some that saw it, that the Duke at such time as the Crowne was first set vpon the Protectors head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but wried his face another way. But men say, that hee was of truth not well at ease which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demand of the Dukes vncourteously reiected, but he both with great gifts and high behests in most louing and trustie manner, departed at Gloucester. But soone after his comming home to Brecknock, hauing there in custody by the commandement of King Richard, Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who (yee before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whose wisedome abused his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the Dukes destruction.

The occasions of the Kings and Dukes falling asunder.

(23) This Bishop was a man of great naturall wit; very well learned, and honourable in behauiour, lacking no wise waies to winne fauour: he had been fast vpon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and naytheless left it not, nor forsooke it in woe, but fled the Realme with the Queen & the Prince, while King Edward had Henry in prison, and neuer came home but to the field. After which lost, and that side vtterly subdued, the other for his fast faith and wisedome not only was content to receiue him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thence forth both in great secret trust, and very special fauour, which he nothing deceiued. For he being (as you haue heard) after King Edwards death, first taken by the Tyrant for his trueth to the King, found the meanes to set this Duke in his top, ioined Gentlemen together in aide of King Henry, deuising first the marriage betweene him and King Edwards daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good seruice to both his masters at once, with infinite benefit to the Realme, by the coniunction of those two bloods in one; whose seuerall titles had long time disquieted the Land; hee fled the Realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the seuenth got him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England, whereunto the Pope ioined the honour of a Cardinall. Thus liuing many dayes in as much honour, as one man might well wish, ended them so godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

Buckingham fained himselfe sick not to attend K. Henry.

(24) This man therefore, as I was about to tell you, by the long and often alternate proofe, aswell of prosperitie as aduerse fortunes, had gotten by great experience (the very mother or mistresse of Wisedome) a deepe insight in politicke worldly drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this Duke glad to commune with him, fed him with faire words, and many pleasant praises. And perceiuing by the processe of their communication, the Dukes pride now and then balke out a litle bread of enuy, towards the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily sought fought the wayes to pricke him forward, taking alwayes the occasion of his comming, and keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that hee rather seemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke first began to praise & boast of the King, and shew how much profite the Realme should take by his raigne; Morton answered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lye, for if I would sweare the contrary, your Lordship would not ween I beleeue, but that if the world would haue gone, as I could haue wished, King Henries son had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, and King Edward to raigne, I was neuer so mad, that I would with a dead man striue against a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chapplaine, and glad would haue beene, that his child should haue succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret iudgement of God haue otherwise prouided, I purpose not to spurne against the pricke, nor labor to set vp, that God putteth downe. And as for the late protector and now King, and euen there he left: saying, that hee had already medled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke and his Beades, and no further.

(24) Then longed the Duke sore to heare what he would haue said, because he ended with the king, and there so suddainly stopped, and exhorted him so familiarly betweene them twaine, to be bolde to say whatsoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfully promised there should neuer come hurt, and peraduenture more good then he would weene, and that himselfe intended to vse his faithfull secret aduise and counsell, which he said was the only cause for which he procured of the King to haue him in his custody, where he might account himselfe at home, and else had he beene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue found the like fauour. The Bishop right humbly thanked him and said: In good faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. Forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I think on Æsops tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed vpon paine of death there should no horned beast abide in the wood, one that had in his forehead a bunch of flesh, fled away a great pace. The foxe who saw him runne so fast, asked him whether he made all that haste? and he answered, In faith, I neither wot, nor recke, so I were once hence, because of this Proclamation made against horned beasts. What foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maist abide well enough, the Lion meant not thee, for it is no horne that is in thy head. No mary (quoth he) that wot I wellynough, but what if he call it a horne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and said, my Lord I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boare shall picke any matter at any thing heere spoken, for it shall neuer come to their eares. In good faith Sir, said the Bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to say, (taken aswell as afore God I meant it) could deserue but thankes; and yet taken as I weene it would, might happely turne me to litle good, and you to lesse. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; whereupon the Bishop said, in good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, sith he is now King in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the weale of this Realme, wherof his Grace hath now the gouernance, and my selfe am a poore member, I was about to wish, that to those good abilities, whereof hee hath already right many, little needing my praise, it might yet haue pleased God for the better store, to haue giuen him some of such other excellent vertues meet for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the person of your Grace: and there left againe.

(25) The Duke somewhat marualing at his suddaine pauses, said: My Lord, I note your often breathings and suddaine stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your wordes neither come to any direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to vs both, maketh mee not a little to muse, thinking that you haue some other priuie imagination imprinted in your heart, which you bee abashed to disclose, and specially to me, which on my honour doe assure you to be as secret in this case as the deafe and dumbe person to the singer, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the Dukes promise, but most of all animated; because hee knew the Duke desirous to be magnified, and also he perceiued the inward hatred which hee bare towards King Richard, hee opened his stomacke to the bottome, and said: My singular good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custodie, I may rather call it a libertie, then a strait imprisonment, in auoiding of idlenesse mother of all vices, in reading bookes and ancient pamphlets, I haue founde this sentence written, that no man is borne free and at libertie of himselfe onely: for one part of dutie he oweth to his parents, another part to his friends and kindred; but the natiue Countrey in the which he first tasted this pleasant & flattering world, demandeth a debt not to be forgottē. Which saying, causeth mee to consider in what case the Realme, my natiue Countrey, now standeth; and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued; what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler wee might haue; for I plainely perceiue (the Realme being in this case) must needes decay, and be brought to confusion: but one hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble personage, your justice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale and ardent loue towards your naturall Country; and in like manner, the loue of your countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which so much doth abound in your person; I must needs thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath such a Prince in store, meete and apt to bee Gouernour. But on the other side, when I call to memory the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called King, so violated by tyranny, so altered by vsurped authoritie, and so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that hee is neither meet to bee King of so noble a Realme, nor so famous a Realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant. Was not his first enterprise to obtaine the Crowne, begunne by the murther of diuers personages? did hee not secondarily proceed against his owne natural mother; declaring her openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing? declaring furthermore, his two brethren and two Nephewes to bee bastards, and to bee borne in adultery? yet not contented, after hee had obtained the Garland, he caused the two poore innocents his Nephewes, committed to him, to bee most shamefully murthered: the blood of which little babes daily cry to God from the earth for vengeance. What surety can be in this Land to any person; either for life or goods, vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and much lesse the losse of others. But now to conclude, what I meane towards your noble person, I say & affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your natiue countrey, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countreymen from the bondage of such a tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I adiure you by the faith you owe vnto God, to deuise some wayes how this Realme may bee brought to some conuenient regiment, vnder some good Gouernour. ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a great while, so that night they communed no more.

The next dayes conference.

(26) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom hee said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in heart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you bee a sure friend, a trustie counsellor, and a very louer of your countrey. And sith that at our last communication, you haue disclosed the secrets of your hart touching the now vsurper of the crown, & also haue alittle touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Yorke and Lancaster, I shall likewise declare vnto you my priuie intents and secret cogitations. And to beginne, when King Edward was deceased, I then began to studie, and with deliberation to ponder in what manner this Realme should be gouerned: I perswaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Glouceſter, whom I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurie, and so by my means he was made Protector both of the King and Realm; which authoritie being once gotten, he neuer ceased priuily to require mee and other Lords aswell spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when hee saw me somewhat sticke at, hee then brought in instruments, authenticke Doctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depositions of diuers witnesses, testifying King Edwards children to bee bastards: which depositions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to bee fained. When the said depositions were before vs read, and diligently heard, he stood vp bare headed, saying: well my Lords, euen as I and you would that my Nephewes should haue no wrong: so I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for these witnesses and sayings of famous Doctors bee true: For I am onely the vndubitate heire to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, adiudged to be the very heire to the Crowne of this Realme by authoritie of Parliament. Which things so by learned men for veritie to vs declared, caused mee and others to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted Prince and Soueraigne Lord. So againe by my ayde, hee of a Protector was made a King: but when he was once crowned King, and in full possession of the Realme, hee cast away his old conditions. For, when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Earle of Hertfords Lands, which his brother Edward wrongfully deteined from me, and also required to haue the office of the high Constableship of England, as diuers of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long discent continued; in this my first suite, hee did not only first delay mee, and afterwards deny me, but gaue mee such vnkinde words, as though I had neuer furthered him: all which I suffered patiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grudged, insomuch as I abhorred the sight of him; I took my leaue of the Court, and returned to Brecknocke to you, but in my iourney as I came, I had diuers imaginations how to depriue this vnnaturall vncle. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occasion giuen. For I well saw hee was disdained of the Lords Temporall, and accursed of the Lordes Spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode betweene Worceſter and Bridgenorth, I encountred with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmund, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and sole heire to Iohn Duke of Sommerset my Grandfathers elder brother, so that she & her sonne Henry Earle of Richmund be both between me and the gate, to enter into the Maiestie roiall, & getting of the Crowne; and when wee had a little communed concerning her sonne, and were departed, I then beganne to dispute with my selfe, whether I were best to take it vpon me, by the election of the Nobility and Communalty, or to take it by power. Thus standing in a wauering ambiguity, I considered first, the office, duety, and paine of a King, which surely I thinke that no mortall man can iustly and truly obserue, except he be elected of God, as K. Dauid was.

(27) But further I remembred, that if I once took vpon me the Gouernance of the Realme, the daughters of King Edward and their Allies, being both for his sake much beloued, and also for the great iniurie done to them much pitied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of me. Semblably my cosin the Earle of Richmond, his aides and kinsfolkes will surely attempt either to bite, or to pierce me on the other side, so that my life and rule should euer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or deposition: And if the said two linages of Yorke and Lancaster should ioine in one against me, then were I surely matched. Wherfore I haue cleerelie determined, vtterly to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crown. For as I told you, the Countesse of Richmond in my returne from the new named King, meeting me in the high way, praied me first for kindreds sake, secondly for the loue I bare to my Grandfather Duke Humfrey, who was sworne brother to her father, to moue the King to be good to her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleasure so to doe, shee promised that the Earle her sonne should marry one of the Kings daughters at the appointment of the King, without any thing demanded for the said espousals, but only the Kings fauour, which request I soone ouerpassed and departed. But after in my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bent, that the Earle of Richmond heire of the house of Lancaster, shall take to wife Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster may be vnited in one.

(28) When the Duke had said, Bishop Morton who euer fauoured the house of Lancaster, was wondrous ioyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and lest the Dukes courage should asswage, or his minde alter, he said to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, sith by Gods prouision, and your incomparable wisdome, this noble coniunction is first moued, it is necessary to consider what persons we shall first make priuie of this politicke conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Earles mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: sith you will begin that way (said the Bishop) I haue an old friend with the Countesse, called Reinald Bray, for whom I shall send, if it be your pleasure: so the Bishop wrote for him to come to Brecknock, who straite came backe with the messenger, where the Duke and Bishop declared what they had deuised for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, sonne to his Lady and Mistresse: willing her first to compasse how to obtaine the goodwill of Queene Elizabeth, and also of her eldest daughter: and after secretly to send to her sonne in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepared for him, if he would sweare to marrie the Ladie Elizabeth assoone as hee was King of the Realme. With which conclusion, Reinold Bray with a glad heart returned to the Countesse his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Bishop told the Duke, that if he were in his Isle of Ely, he could make many friends to further their enterprise. The Duke knew this to bee true, but yet loth to loose the society of such a Counsellor, gaue him faire words, saying, he should shortly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the Bishop ere the Dukes company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed and came to Ely, where he found money and friends, and then sailed into Flaunders, where he did the Earle of Richmond good seruice.

(29) When Reinold Bray had declared his message to the Countesse, no meruaile if shee were glad; wherefore wherefore ſhee deuiſed a means how to breake this matter to Queen Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Weſtminſter, and hauing in her family a certaine Welſhman called Lewis learned in Phiſicke, now hauing oportunity to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come, that her ſonne ſhould be ioined in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard ſhould out of all honour and eſtate be deiected, and required him to goe to Queene Elizabeth not as a meſſenger, but as one that came friendlie to viſite her, and as time and place ſhould ſerue to make her priuy of this deuiſe. This Phiſitian with good diligence repaired to the Queene, and when he ſaw time conuenient ſaid vnto her: Madame although my imagination be very ſimple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am ſo bolde to vtter vnto you a ſecret conceit, which I haue compaſſed in my braine. When I remember the great loſſe which you haue ſuſtained by the death of your louing husband, and the great ſorrow that you haue ſuffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no leſſe doe, then daily ſtudy how to bring your heart to comfort, and alſo to reuenge the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell tyrant King Richard. And firſt conſider what battel, and what miſchiefe haue riſen by the diſſention betweene the two houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter, which two families if they may be ioined in one, I doubt not but that your line ſhall be again reſtored to your great ioy & comfort: you know Madam, that of the houſe of Lancaſter, the Earle of Richmund is next of bloud, & to the houſe of York your daughters now are heirs. If you could deuiſe the means how to couple your eldeſt daughter with the Earle of Richmund in matrimony, no doubt, but that the vſurper ſhould ſhortly bee depoſed, and your heire againe to her right reſtored.

(30) When the Queene had heard this friendly Motion, ſhee inſtantly beſought him, that as he had beene the firſt inuentor of ſo good an enterpriſe, that now hee would not deſiſt to follow the ſame, requiring him further, that he would reſort to the Counteſſe of Richmund, mother to the Earle Henrie, and to declare to her on the Queenes behalfe, that all the friends of King Edward her husband, ſhould aſſiſt and take part with the Earle of Richmund her ſonne, ſo that hee would take an oath, that after the Kingdome obtained, to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. M. Lewis ſo ſped his buſines, that he made a finall end of this buſineſſe, betweene the two mothers: ſo the Lady Margaret Counteſſe of Richmund, brought to a good hope of the preferment of her ſon, made Reinold Bray chiefe ſoliciter of this conſpiracy, giuing him in charge ſecretly to inueagle ſuch perſons of Nobility to ioyne with her, & take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

(31) This Reinold Bray within few dayes brought to his luer Sir Giles Daubeny, Sir Iohn Cheinie Knights, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ramney Eſquiers, and others. In the meane while the Counteſſe of Richmund ſent one Chriſtopher Vrſewicke, a Prieſt into Britaine, to the Earle of Richmund her ſonne, to declare to him all the agreements between her and the Queene agreede: and with all to ſhew him that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the firſt Inuenters of this enterpriſe: ſhee likewiſe ſent Hugh Conway an Eſquire into Britaine with a great ſumme of money, giuing him in charge to declare to the Earle, the great loue that the moſt part of the Nobility of the Realme bare towards him, willing him not to neglect ſo good an occaſion offered, but with all ſpeed to ſetle his mind how to return into England, and therewithall aduiſing him to take land in Wales. When the Earle had receiued this ioyfull meſſage, hee brake to the Duke of Britaine all his ſecrets, aduertiſing him that he was entred into a ſure & ſtedfaſt hope to obtaine the Crown of England, deſiring him of help towards the atchieuing of his enterpriſe, which the Duke promiſed, & afterwards performed: whereupon the Earle ſent back again Hugh Conway, & Th. Ramney to declare his cõming ſhortly into *Engl*ãd.

(32) In the meane ſeaſon the chiefe of the conſpiracy in England beganne many enterpriſes, which being neuer ſo priuily handled, yet knowledge thereof came to King Richard, and becauſe hee knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head, and aide of this combination, he thought it moſt neceſſarie to plucke him from that part, and thereupon addreſſed his louing letrers vnto the Duke, requeſting him moſt earneſtly to come to the Court, whoſe graue aduiſe for counſell hee then ſtood much in need of; with many words of kind complements to bee vttered from the mouth of the meſſenger: but the Duke miſtruſting thoſe ſweet promiſes proceeded out of a bitter intent, and knowing K. Richard to ſpeak moſt fayreſt when he meant fouleſt play, deſired the king of pardon, excuſing himſelf that he was ſickly & not wel able to trauel: which excuſe the king would not admit, but ſent other letters with checking wordes, commanding him without delay to repaire to his preſence: vnto which the Duke made a determinate anſwere that hee would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared war againſt him. Whereupon Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet came out of Sanctuary, and gathered a great band of men in the County of Yorke, Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his brother, Biſhoppe of Exceſter, raiſed another Armie in Deuonſhire and Cornwall, and in Kent, Sir Richard Guilford, and other Gentlemen raiſed a Company, and all this was dõne euen in one moment.

(33) King Richard rouzed from his pleaſures in progreſſe, ſent forth commiſſion to muſter his men, and with a great preparation from London marched towardes Salisbury, thinking it not beſt to diſparkle his power into ſmall parts in purſuing his enemies euery way at one, and therefore omitting all others with a great puiſſance went to ſet vpon the Duke of Buckingham, the head of the ſpring. The Duke hearing of the Kings approach, made out to meet him before hee came too farre, accompanied with a great power of wild Welſhmen, whom hee had enforced to follow him, more by his Lordly commandement then by liberall wages, which thing indeed was the cauſe that they fell off, and forſooke him. His march was through the forreſt of Deane, intending for Gloceſter, where hee meant to paſſe Seuerne, and ſo haue ioined his Army with the Courtneys, & other Weſtern men, which had he done, no doubt K. Richard had been in great ieopardie. But before hee could attaine the Seuerne ſide, by force of continuall raine the riuer roſe ſo high, that it ouerflowed all the country adioyning, and was not againe bounded within his owne bankes for the ſpace of ten dayes, ſo that the Duke could not get ouer, nor his complices any wiſe come vnto him, during which time the Welſhmen lingring idle, without wages, or victual, ſodainelie brake vp Campe and departed; whereupon the Duke was wonderouſly perplexed, not knowing how to recouer this vnfortunate chance, and deſtitute of power, to ſhew himſelfe in field, ſought to ſecure himſelfe in ſecret, till deſtiny aſſigned him a better day.

(34) A ſeruant he had in eſpeciall fauour & truſt brought vp tenderly by him, and riſen to great wealth and eſteeme, his name was Humfrey Baniſter, and place of reſidence neere vnto Shrewsburie, whither the diſtreſſed Duke in diſguiſe repaired, intending there to remain ſecret, vntil he might either raiſe a new power, or elſe by ſome meanes conuay himſelfe vnto Britaine to Henry Earle of Richmund: but as ſoone as the others which had attempted the ſame enterpriſe againſt the King, had knowledge that Buckingham was forſaken of his Company, and could not be found, as men ſtrucke in ſodaine feare ſhifted euery one for himſelfe, many of them taking Sanctuary, but the moſt of the chiefeſt took into Britaine

A proclamation for the apprehenſion of the Duke of Buckingham.

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy ſeene, his hopes were encreaſed, and feares daily leſſe; yet being a Prince politicke and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be ſecurely kept, & knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the reſt, made proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promiſing a thouſand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his faults, to enioy the Kings fauour, and if hee were a bondman, preſently to bee made free. Baniſter minding the preſent, and forgetting what was paſt, ſpread his lappe firſt to receiue this golden ſhower, and in hope of this gaine, made no conſcience to betray his own Lord, who had now laid his life vpon truſt in his hands: hee therefore repayring to the Shiriffe of Shrewsbury, reuealed the Duke, who diſguiſed like a poore Countriman, and digging in a groue neere vnto Baniſters houſe, was apprehended, and with a great guard of men was brought vnto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignement or iudgement, vpon the ſecond of Nouember he loſt his head: whoſe death was the leſſe lamented, for that himſelfe had been the chiefe Inſtrument to ſet the Crowne wrongfully vpon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Baniſter was moſt ſeuerely puniſhed, as many haue obſerued, not onely in the loſſe of his reward promiſed, which he neuer had, and infamy receiued, neuer after ſhaken off; but alſo in himſelfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldeſt ſonne and heire fell mad, and dyed ſo diſtracted in a Boares Stye: his ſecond ſonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third ſonne was drowned in a ſmall puddle of water; his eldeſt daughter was ſodainely ſtrucke with a foule leproſie, and himſelfe being of extreame age, was arraigned and found guilty of murder, and by his Clergy ſaued his life.

A Commotion in Kent.

(36) An other Commotion at the ſame time was in Kent, where George Browne and Iohn Gilford Knights, Foge, Scot, Clifford, and Bonting, with fiue thouſand men attempted great matters at Grauesend, but hearing of the Duke of Buckinghams ſurpriſe, diſperſed themſelues for that time. But when King Richard perceiued how hee was euery where beſet, he ſent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumuent and impriſon Earle Henry, who as hee feared was too well friended in thoſe forraine parts, which thing indeed this Hutton well perceiued, and ſo to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this baite, whereupon, thoſe that lately fled England, were indited of treaſon, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights with foure others were beheaded at London, and at Exceter for the like cauſe dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutcheſſe of Exceſter, King Richards own ſiſter, with others; ſo iealous was the King of his vſurped Crowne; and that nothing ſhould be laide to vnprouident foreſight, the coaſts hee ſtored with Armies of men, furniſhed the Ports with ſtore of Prouiſion, and made all things ready to withſtand Earle Henries arriuall. Who now hauing gotten aide of fiue thouſand Britaines, with forty veſſels wel furniſhed, ſet ſaile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with ſo terrible a tempeſt, that his Fleet was diſparkled, ſome into Normandy, and ſome compelled to returne into Britaine, only the Earles ſhip with one other kept the Seas, being ſore toſſed all night, and in the morning arriued in the mouth of Poole in the County of Dorſet, where hee might behold the Shore full of men ſhining in armour, to his great amaſement, whereupon hee ſent out his ſhippe-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their anſwere was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the comming of the Earle of Richmund, to conduct him in ſafety to the Duke, who lay encamped not far off, that ſo ioyning their forces, they might proſecute Richard the vſurper, who being in a maner deſtitute of men, was ſore diſtracted, and deſperate in his owne deſignes. Theſe ſmooth vntruthes notwithſtanding Earle Henry auoided, and with a forward gale returned to Normandy, whence he ſent Meſſengers vnto young Charles King of France, whoſe father King Lewis was lately departed this life, to haue his ſafe conduct to returne into Britaine, which eaſily was granted with fauourable complements returned to the Earle. Lord Henry thus croſſed by ſea, had preſent news of Buckinghams ſurpriſe and death, with the flight of the Nobles eſcaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmund in Britaine, fell forthwith into Counſell: where firſt it was determined that Earle Henry ſhould take his oath to eſpouſe the Lady Elizabeth eldeſt daughter vnto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which hee ſolemnly did in the Church at Rhedon; and they for their parts ſware vnto him fealty, doing him homage with no leſſe reſpect then vnto their ſole and crowned King.

(37) Of theſe proceedings King Richard ſoone heard, which indeed greatly appalled his thoughts, and all penſiue and ſad he returned out of the Weſt towards London, where to cut off the hopes of Richmunds further claime, hee cauſed a Parliament to be aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and therein attainted the ſaid Earle Henry himſelfe, and all ſuch as had fled the land in his behalfe, enacting them enemies to their naturall Country, their goods to be confiſcated, and all their lands and poſſeſſions to be ſeiſed vpon to the Kings vſe, which was ſo forwarded by his lewd Counſellors, and ſo executed by his fawning followers, that ſome better affected, ſet forth the preſent and oppreſſed eſtate in theſe ſcoffing rimes, to their further diſgrace, diuulging their names in manner as followeth;

(38) King Richards ſtate ſtanding in dangers abroad, and not altogether free from conſpiracies at home, hee thought it beſt policy to enter amitie with Scotland, which hee did for the terme of three yeeres, and the more firme to aſſure himſelfe of that King, hee intreated a marriage betwixt the Duke of Rothſay the kings eldeſt ſonne, and the Lady de la Pole daughter to Iohn Duke of Suffolke, and to the Dutcheſſe Elizabeth king Richards owne ſiſter, whom hee ſo much fauoured, as that after the death of his owne ſonne, he proclaimed Iohn Earle of Lincolne, her ſonne and his Nephew, heire apparant to the Crowne of England, diſinheriting King Edwards daughters, whoſe brothers hee had before murdered.

(39) His feares nothing leſſened, but rather daily increaſed, he attempted once more to ſtop the Currant which led to the ſpring, to which end he ſent his Ambaſſadours loaden with gold, and many gay promiſes vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, offring to giue him all Richmonds lands, and yeerely reuenues if he would either ſend the ſaid Earle into England or commit him there vnto priſon. the Dukes Court, could haue no communication with him, he lying extremely ſicke, and his wits too weake to entertaine diſcourſe. Whereupon Peter Landoſe his Treaſurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authority, tooke the motion into hand, vnto whom the Engliſh Ambaſſadors promiſed all the Earles Reuenews if he could bring King Richards requeſt to paſſe. He greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he would, promiſed to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus whileſt meſſengers poſted betwixt Peter and Richard, Iohn Biſhop of Elie being then in Flaunders, was certified by Chriſtopher Vrſwicke of all the circumſtances of this purpoſe, whereupon the Biſhop with all poſſible haſt, ſent the ſame intelligence the ſame day, and by the ſame man vnto Earle Henry in Britain, willing him to ſhift himſelf and followers into France: who forthwith ſent Vrſwick vnto King Charles to haue his licence that he might with his good liking come into his dominions, which being obtained he cauſed the other Lords vnder pretence to viſite the ſicke Duke to eſcape into Anion, and two daies after changing his Apparrell with his ſeruant, waited vpon him as vpon his Maſter, and poſted thence into France: whoſe eſcape when the Treaſurer heard of, he ſent after to apprehend him, and that in ſuch haſt as at his entrance into the French dominions they were hard at his heeles.

(40) This ſuddaine flight of the Earle and of the other Engliſh Lords, the Duke of Britaine (being ſomwhat recouered of his dangerous ſickneſs) tooke very greeuouſly, imputing it a great diſhonour vnto himſelfe, to ſuffer the leaſt ſuſpect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therefore ſore offended at Landoſe whom he ſuſpected to be deepe in the deed, he ſent for Edward Wooduile and Edward Pownings two Engliſh Eſquires, vnto whom he deliuered a ſumme of money which he had promiſed to Earle Henrie, with a conuey vnto all the reſt of the Engliſh, to depart Vannes, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was King Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond againſt the Tyrant and Vſurper of the Engliſh Crowne. And the more to ioy Henry, Iohn Earle of Oxford impriſoned by King Edward the fourth in the Caſtle of Hammes; with Captaine Blunt his keeper, and Sir Iohn Forteſcue Porter of Calis, came vnto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of his. This Earle of Oxford, as we haue ſeene, was a continuall aider of King Henry the ſixt, againſt his oppoſite K. Edward, and had done many ſeruices in the Lancaſtrians cauſe, till deſtiny had caſt downe the hopes of their ſide. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Counſellor for warre, as for experience, policy, valour, and faith in that buſines, no man was more meete. Whoſe proweſſe further appeared when Earle Henry wan the wreath at Boſworth field, where, in the Front of that Battell he lead the band of Archers, and euer after liued in great fauour with this King Henry the ſeuenth, and in great honour died the fourth yeere of King Henry the eight. In the like truſt for Counſell and fauour with theſe Kings, was Richard Fox Doctor of Diuinitie, who being then a ſtudent in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefeſt man for imploiment in his French buſines, which he ſo prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall aduancers, made him of his Priuie Councell, Lord Priuie Seale, and raiſed him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth, and laſtly to teſtifie in what deere eſteeme hee held him, made him Godfather to his ſonne Prince Henrie, who was after King of England with whom in great reuerence he liued a long time, euen till his eye-ſight failed through age, and did many workes of piety, whereof Corpus Chriſti Colledge in Oxford, is and ſhall be for euer a noble witnes; and his honorable care of reuerend antiquity, in preſeruing the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him beſtowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedrall Church of Wincheſter, ſhall neuer want due celebration amongſt all that honour antiquity and glorious ſtudies. But from theſe worthy Subiects, we returne againe to their ſoueraigne King Henry.

(41) Whoſe beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Britaine and the French King, drew many Engliſh into France, and filled the heart of the Vſurper with an extreme feare; therefore to accompliſh by pollicy, what was doubtfull by armes, he ſought to baite his hooke yet another way. The title hee knew ſtood with the daughters of King Edward (his ſonnes being murdered) and among them to Ladie Elizabeth the eldeſt, whoſe marriage he well ſaw muſt bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diuerted, his ſtreame of it ſelfe could beare no great floate, nor bring any inundation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary muſt be Courted, that her daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This ſo cunningly was carried, by men that could carry themſelues to fit womens affections, that the King was purged of the murder of her ſonnes; ſhee made to beleeue that her ſelfe was reſpected a Dowager Queene, and ſiſter in law to the preſent King, and that himſelfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres moſt fit matches for thoſe Princes her daughters; that her ſonne Thomas Marqueſſe Dorſet, whilſt he followed the Runaway Henry, left his honorable preferments intended to him ward; and laſtly requiring a reconciliation with the Queene, forgaue all iniuries vttered againſt him out of her womaniſh paſſions, with a moſt willing heart: and indeed theſe meſſengers were ſuch Crafts-maſters as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles Paradiſe, and made her beleeue that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things paſſed before, as the murder of her ſonnes, the diſhonour of her husband, the baſtardy of their Children, and her owne ſcandall for Sorcery: nor remembring the faithfull promiſe ſhee made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, ſhee deliuered her fiue daughters as lambes committed to the rauening wolfe, in which act of hers is ſeene the weakenes of that Sexe, and the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined; for preſently vpon the deliuery of her daughters, ſhee ſent priuily for the Lord Marqueſſe Dorſet her ſonne, then reſiding in Paris, willing him to deſiſt from the Earles Faction, and come vnto King Richard, who promiſed him preferment, and that her ſelfe and daughters were in high fauour, all iniuries on both parts forgiuen and forgotten.

(42) This entrance made vnto the Tragedy intended, to furniſh the ſtage and finiſh the Scene of her owne life, the next Actor muſt be Queene Anne, who onely now ſtood in the Tyrants way, her death he meant ſhould giue life to his intruded regencie, and adde a further Claime and ſtrength to the poſſeſſion which he already had, by matching with his Neece the next heire vnto the Crowne the Lady Elizabeth, the let onely reſting that himſelfe had a wife, her death therefore muſt immediately bee ſought, yet ſo as the honorable repute of his name ſhould no waies be impeached, euer carrying himſelfe in outward ſemblance for a good religious honeſt man, and much deſirous that his people ſhould account him ſo. Firſt therefore he began to lament the barrennes of his wiues wombe, and the great dangers that the Realme was like to ſuſtaine, if himſelfe ſhould die Iſſuleſſe, complaining often thereof vnto his Nobility, but moſt eſpecially vnto *Archbiſhop Rotheram lately releaſed out of priſon, whereby the Prelate coniectured Queene Anne had not long to liue. Then refrained he her bed vnder pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a ſcourge for his owne ſinnes, which day and night he ſought to expiate by praiers: His next pollicy was, how her death might be wrought with the leaſt ſuſpect of wrong, and how taken when ſhee was gone: Therefore fore as an assay to the Peoples taste, he caused it to be giuen forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was so commonly diuulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne eare, and shee hauing had sufficient experience of her husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, mistrusting (and not without cause) that her life was in danger, whereupon all dismaid with a lamentable countenance, shee came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence shee had done, that the sentence of death was giuen against her already. Richard made it strange to see her so perplext, and with louing words and smiling semblance, bad her liue to scandalize report, and to thinke that many yeeres were yet added to her life, but whether in conceit for sorrow, or of poison, I cannot say, she died shortlie after, and was solemnely buried in the Abbey of Westminster.

(43) The King thus deliuered from the bands of Matrimony, and now a widower at liberty to choose where he would, cast glances of loue towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and began to court her for his second Queene, but the thing was so offensiue to the law of nature, and so directly against the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and most of all the maiden her selfe, which Richard perceiuing, hee forbare ouer earnest pursuite to gaine his time and all fit occasions; but most especially, hauing no leasure to woo, his subiects on al sides daily reuolting, and his Nobles more and more had in suspect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby who had married Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmund, Earle Henries owne mother: him therefore hee most mistrusted, and before he would admit his departure from Court, he commanded him to leaue his sonne and heire George Stanley the Lord Strange for his hostage, which he did, though it little auailed to binde Darbies affection vnto his side.

Thomas Earle of Darby much suspected of the King.

George Lord Strange deliuered in pledge to King Richard.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had escaped out of the Castle of Hammes, and that he, with the Captaine thereof Iames Blunt, were fled into France and ioined with Richmund; thought it high time to quench the sparkes in those parts, before they should rise to a higher flame; and therefore hee appointed (which was presently accomplished) the Garrison at Callis to strait the said Castle with a hard siege, being well assured that many welwillers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who vpon the least aduantage would be ready to play. But Henry not vnmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Hostesse Captaine Blunts wife, made vnto the Peece, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirty approued Souldiers into the Castle, who from the walles plaied vpon the beseigers, whiles Oxford annoied them vpon their backes, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition, which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in Subiection to the King.

Hammes besieged by the Garrison of Calis.

The Earle of Oxford freeth his old friends from Hammes.

(45) Hammes thus restored in danger to be lost, and nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected persons; King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no inuasion at home, imagined that much harme could not bee done abroad: for Henry in France (as he thought) found very few friends, and was fully perswaded that the French Kings assistance stood more of words then in deedes. And indeed some occasion of such suspition was ministred, for King Charles but young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite vnto them man by man. Besides Thomas Marquesse Dorset sent for by his mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which stroke great feare among Earle Henries part, chiefely for that all their Counsels were knowne vnto the Marquesse, which if he should reueale, their designes were made desperate. To preuent which, hee was posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard to lessen his great charges, discharged his Nauy at seas, commanding the welsh to watch the shoare; Beacons to be built, and armour to bee ready at euery call; then giuing his affections leaue to entertaine more security, saw not the sword that hung ouer his head.

King Richard chargeth his Naue.

(46) But Earle Henrie deliuered from the feare of the Marquesse, thought it not best to prolong time, lest others vpon like purposes should bewray his intents; and thereupon obtaining a small aide of the French with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marquesse (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir Iohn Bourchier were left in pledge, hee set forward to Roan, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of Seyn: whither tidings was brought him of Queene Annes death, & that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed farre exceeding the former, shee being the Princesse by whom hee must claime, whereupon much distemperature arose, euery mans braine working vpon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make ouer into England, to interpose the proceedings ere the match was fully made, whereupon Earle Richmund with two thousand men onely, and a small number of ships, set sayle from Harfleut the fifteenth of August, and the seuenth day following arriued at Milford hauen in Wales, where taking land hee came vnto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford west, ten miles into the Maine, from thence he marched to Cardigan, where he had newes that the Countrey was forelaid against him, but finding that vntrue, he made still forward, beating downe such Houlds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified vnto them, he meant to passe Seuerne, at Shrewesbury, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewesbury, there mette him Sir Rice ap Thomas a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quarrell, which Henry afterwards requited in making this his first aider the Gouernour of Wales.

(47) The Earle more boldly from Shrewsburie, held on his march to the Towne of Newport, whither Sir Gilbert Talbot with two thousand strong from the young Earle of Shrewsbury gaue him his aide. Then passed he forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley, and proceeding forward was honourably receiued into the City Lichfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby with fiue thousand armed men had beene some few daies before, but hearing of Earle Henries approach remoued to Anderson to auoide suspition of the jealous King that kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

(48) King Richard at this time helde his Court at Notingham, where being informed that Earle Henrie with a small company was landed in Wales, made small account of what he could doe, altogether relying vpon the Lord Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice ap Thomas two principall men, in whom hee conceiued no little trust: yet lest this new risen spring might gather in more heads, he sent to Iohn Duke of Norfolk, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey willing them with a selected power to represse the insolency of this head-strong Earle: moreouer he sent for Sir Robert Brakenburie Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bourchier, and Sir Walter Hungerford Knights, all of them in great iealousie and mistrust, commanding them with their forces to come and attend vpon his person which accordingly they set forward to doe, meane while sending his Spials to know the way Henrie went, had intelligence that hee was past Shrewsbury without any impeachment; whereat storming in choller and cursing their vntruthes whom hee had put in trust, craued vengeance from heauen, and instantly ſtantly intended to reuenge it himſelfe; then hauing notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his partie increaſed by daily repaire, incontinently hee marſhalled his followers; and like a valiant Captaine and politike leader ſet forward his Battailes fiue and fiue in a rancke. In the middeſt of his troopes he beſtowed the Carriages belonging to his Army: and himſelfe mounted vpon a white Courſer, inuironed with his Guard, followed by his footmen, and the wings of Horſemen ranged on euery ſide, with a frowning ſterne countenance, but yet in great Pompee, ntred the towne of Leiceſter after the Sun was ſet, being full of indignation and ſwelling in anger, which ſomewhat he aſſwaged with threats of reuenge.

(49) Earle Richmund from Lichfield departed for Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourchier and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who vpon this vnlooked for occaſion, and knowing themſelues in what ſuſpition they ſtood, ſecretly left the company of their Captaine Brakenbury the night following, and wandring in waies vnknowne, with much adoe gotte ſafely vnto the Earles Companies.

(50) In the like danger through darkeneſſe of night, Henry himſelfe chanced to come; for albeit he was a man both valiant and forwad, and by his owne wiſdome could manage his weightieſt affaires; Yet now hauing notice that King Richard with a ſtrong army was neere, and that his father in law, the Lord Stanley ſtood as a Neuter, he was ſtrucke deepe in his dumps, and with twenty light Horſe-men lingering behind, ſo ſeriouſly muſing what was to bee done, as laſtly, he loſt the ſight of his Hoſt, and by the darkeneſſe of night miſſed his way; neither durſt he for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a ſmall village about three miles diſtant, to his no little griefe, and his whole Armies great amaſement, the one prognoſticating it to be a preſage of an ill beginning, and the other doubting ſome detriment of their Lord, but in the dawning of the next morning cõducted by good fortune he came to his Hoſt, excuſing that his abſence was to haue conference with his ſecret friends; and then priuily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

(51) But contrariwiſe, King Richard was wrapped and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir Iohn Sauage, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simond Digby, in whom he had repoſed great truſt, but alſo in the dreadfull dreames which nightly he ſuffered, wherein to his ſeeming, terrible diuels ſo pulled and haled him, as by nomeanes he could take any reſt, which fearefull imaginations ſtrucke ſo deep an impreſſion vnto his heart, that the ſignes thereof appeared in his countenance, howſoeuer hee ſought to put them off in ſhew.

(52) But being determined to put himſelfe to the triall of battell, or elſe, (and that rather) enforced by diuine Iuſtice to pull the reuenging hand of heauen againſt him, in the morning he marched toward the enemy, and vpon a faire plaine called Redmore neere vnto Boſworth about ſeuen miles weſt from Leiceſter he pitched downe his Tents, and thence ſent a Purſeuant to the Lord Stanley, commanding him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his preſence, which if hee refuſed to doe, he ſware by Chriſts paſſion, his ſonnes head ſhould off before that he dined. The Lord Stanley anſwered the Purſeuant, that if the King did ſo, he had more ſonnes aliue; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This anſwere declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded, at the very ſeaſon, when the two Armies came in ſight each of others, but his counſellors tolde him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might better bee done when the field was fought: whereupon the Lord Strange was deliuered priſoner to the keepers of the Kings Tents, and the Kings holy vow thus broke, the Lord Strange eſcaped with life, by this bad tyrants too good a death.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battel being come, he drew out his Army vpon the plaine, whoſe order for fight he thus placed, the foreward he ordered of a maruellous length, to ſtrike the more terror in the Beholders hearts, in whoſe forefront he placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the reſt, the leading whereof was committed to Iohn Duke of Norfolke, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his ſonne, his owne Battaillion was furniſhed with his beſt approued men of warre, hauing Horſmen for wings on both ſides of his battel: and being thus ordered for their further incouragement King Richard mounted in place to bee heard, thus ſaid to his Souldiers.

King Richards Oration vnto his Souldiers.

King Richard confeſſeth his fault.

"how to gouerne a field. What are his followers but "a sort of fainting runagates, whose fearefull eies, "as they could not behold our raies in peace, can "worse abide to see our royal banner displaied against "them in fight; for their owne consciences shall be- "wray their guilt; their oathes, their periury; their "promise, infidelity; and the sight of vs their annoin- "ted Soueraign shall either cause them shamefully to "fly, or submissiuely to yeeld themselues to our mercy. "As touching his French and Britaine aiders, their "valours haue beene well knowne to our Noble "Progenitors, often vanquished but neuer vanqui- "shers, onely braggers without any great deeds, "drunkards without discretion, Ribaulds without "reason, Cowards without resistance, and (in a "word) effeminate, lasciuious, and neuer seene in "the Front of a Battell, seeking ten times more "meanes to flie and escape, then once to assault the "face of their enemies. Therefore like valiant Cap- "taines aduance forth your Standards, and make "knowne your manhood by dint of sword, and be "yee sure that if euery one of you giue but one sure "stroke, the day wilbe ours; for how can a handfull "withstand a whole Realme? Aduance therefore "forward, my Captaines; in whom I well know is "wanting neither courage, pollicy, wisdome, nor "puissance. I therefore desire you, for your loue "to meward, the zeale of your native Countrey, "and the safety of your Prince and selues, to shew "this day your true English valour, and for my selfe "I assure you I will this day either triumph in a "glorious victory, or die in this quarrell with im- "mortall Fame; in whose Palace all our names shall "be enrolled, if we preferre the renowne of our "Countrey, before our owne liues. Now S. George "for vs, and vt for victorie; hast therefore forward, "and remember this, that I am he who with high "aduancement will preferre the valiant and hardy, "and with seuere torture will punish the dastard and "cowardly Runaway. The Oration ended, as it gaue courage to some, so gaue it distast vnto others, whose hearts carried gall though their mouthes dropped hony; some intended to turn to Earle Henry; some determined to take part with the strongest; and some meant to stand still and doe nothing; so vn- sure was he of his Subiects loyaltie, that had been so trayterous to his owne Nephewes.

The diuers opinions of King Richards host.

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard thus embattelled, sent to the Lord Stanley who stood houering aloofe off, to come helpe him to order his fight, whose answere was, that Henry should doe it himselfe, and that he would come to him when he saw time conuenient, which strucke the Earle into a great dumpe, but now hauing no time for delay, ne- cessity compelled him to order his men. The Fore- ward he made single according to his small number of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, o- uer whome Iohn Earle of Oxford was Captaine, the right wing was led by Sir Gilbert Talbot; and the left assigned to Sir Iohn Sauage: Earle Henry himselfe with his vncle Iasper Earle of Pembrooke gouerned the Main-Battell, better repleniſhed with horse, then foote, whose whole number consisted hardly of fiue thousand, the kings doubling the number and more. The Battels thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all peeces sauing his helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, and from wing to wing, incouraging his men, and the more to enerease their hot spirits, mounted vp- on a little banke, the better to be seene and heard, these wordes he vttered in all their hearing.

"(56) If euer God gaue victory to a iust quar- "rell, if euer he aided warre for the tuition of a king- "dome or Countrey, or euer succoured them that "fought for the reliefe of poore Innocents, oppres- "sed by tyranny, then no doubt my friends and fel- "low souldiers, but that this day he will giue vs a "triumphant victory. For if we consider for what, "and against whom we fight, we may not doubt but "that God himselfe will fight for vs. The thing "which we are here ready to try by sword, is the li- "berty of the Land from vnder the vsurpation and "yoake of a Tyrant, and hee, against whom we "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may not call him "man) which feareth neither God, Lawes, Iustice, "nor Humanity, an homicide, a murderer of his "owne kindred, a destroier of the Nobilitie, a Mawle "to his subiects, and a firebrand to the whole King- "dome, whom iust vengeance craueth to haue quen- "ched: and consider I pray you, who be of his band, "euen such as by murder and vntruth to their kin "and Countrey, haue got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your wiues weep, "and Orphanes wander, to seeke their liuelihood "where they can get it, whose teares I doubt not "crie in the eares of the Lord, who will punish these "Malefactors either with pricke of conscience cow- "ardly to flie, or deliuer themselues into our handes "without Battell. Consider further, I pray you, "that in yonder great Battell are men brought more "for feare then for loue, by force compelled and not "willinglie assembled; persons that desire more the "destruction, then the life of their Captaine, and fi- "nally a multitude, whereof the most part be our "friends and the least part his that leades them; and "surely it stands in suspence, whether the malice of "the souldiers towards their Generall, or his feare "conceiued against them, be the greater, for this is a "rule infallible, that as ill men daily couet to destroy "the good, so God appointeth the good men to con- "found the ill, and if it be true that Clerkes preach "that the one is to be hated, and the other beloued, "who then can spare yonder tyrant Richard Duke of "Gloceſter vntruly calling himselfe king, that hath "broken both the Lawes of God and man, in the "blood of his brother, the murder of his Nephews, "the death of his wife, the slander of his owne mo- "ther, and the bastardizing of his brethren. If you "haue not heard, yet I haue read that Tarquin the "proud, for the rape of Lucretia, lost the Kingdome "of Rome: yet was not his fact so detestable as Ne- "roes, who slew his owne mother, to behold the "place of his conception: but yonder vsurper is "both these persons in one, a Nero in murder of his "young Nephewes, and in defaming the wombe of "his owne conception: and a Tarquine intending to "defile, and carnally to know his owne Neece vnder "pretext of holy Matrimony, which Lady you are "witnes, I haue sworne shalbe my wife. This is the "quarrell for which we are here this day assembled, "and for whose equity we craue God to be iudge: "a good beginning of his Protection we haue alrea- "dy seene, in escaping the treasons laid for vs in Bri- "taine, the dangers of Seas, and our safe arriuage vnto "this place, not hunted by anie, but rather our selues "hunting after that furious Bore; who this day, and "in this place, is so intangled in his owne toyle, as his "crooked tuskes shall not be able to gnaw the cords "of his snare asunder, nor himselfe haue power, to "free himselfe from his pursuers, whose Iauelines (I "doubt not) shall be died in the blood of this filthie "swine, and shall well rid the world of an vglie hogd- "backed Monster: which thing to accomplish let vs "remember, that victory is not gotten by multitude "but by manhood, but the smaller number we bee, "the greater is our glory if we vanquish, if vanqui- "shed fretting time shall neuer consume our memo- "ry, that died to free our selues, and Nation from "the oppression of an vsurping Tyrant; and thus I "assure you, that for so iust a cause you shall finde "me this day rather a dead Carrion vpon the colde "ground, then a Carpet prisoner kept aliue for re- "proch. Aduance therfore forward like true hearted "Englishmen, display your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conquerors, loose "the Battell, and be villaines; God and Saint George giue vs a happy successe. Which no sooner was said but that the Souldiers buckled their Helmes, the Archers stript vp their sleeues, bent their bowes and frushed frushed their feathers attentiuely listening when the Trumpet should giue the sound of Battell.

(57) Betwixt both the Armies there lay a great marish, which Earle Henry left vpon his right hand, with purpose to haue that for a defence, as also the Sunne at his backe, and face of the enemy, which when King Richard perceiued, with sound of trumpet and shout of his Army, hee passed the Marish, when the bow-men on both sides let freely flie their arrowes: the rest comming to encounter with strokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to be encompassed by the enemy, commanded euery of his rankes to keepe within ten foot of his Standard, which being accomplished, and their fight a while stayed, their opposites mistrusting some fraud or deceit, ceased likewise from theirs, many of them willing inough so to doe; notwithstanding, the L. Stanley at the same time ioyning with the Earle, a cruell battell was againe begunne, and manfully continued vpon either part. Till lastly, King Richard hauing intelligence that the Earle of Richmund was but slenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them also busied in their owne guardes, meant by his incounter to finish the day, as the onely man, vpon whom stood all the hope of his enemies successe; and therefore hauing the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne battell, and vpon the spur with his Speare in his Rest, ranne violently towards him in a furious spleen; in which rage, at the first brunt, hee bare downe and ouerthrew the Earles Standard, and slew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next matching with Sir Iohn Cheiney a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open passage by dint of sword vnto the Earle himselfe: Richmund beholding the high valour of Richard, most lion-like coped with this cruell Bore, and held him maugre his tuskes at his sword point, betwixt whom the fight was so desperate, that Henries company were strucke in great despaire; at which very instant Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand tal fresh Souldiers, who entred the battell with such courage and valour, as they bare down all before them where they went, whereat the Kings side began to faint, and to giue ouer fight, but the more resolute a while maintaining their ground, and now mistrusting treason among themselues, turned their backes and ran away, whereby King Richard presently perceiued the downefall of his ill raised glory, and the full period of his short raigne: and all hope of resistance now past, a swift horse was brought to escape the field, with comforts that another day might set the victory on his side: but with a mind vnmatchable in hatred against Henry, or rather to haue his death registred in fames honorable role, whose life had beene blotted with the penne of diuulged infamie, hee hastily closed his helmet, saying, that that day should make an end of all battels, or else in this now in trying he would finish his life, which last was presently performed; for thrusting into the middest of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickest, hee obtained more honor in this his two howres fight, then he had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(58) There died that day with him Iohn Duke of Norfolke, Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more: Sir William Catesby one of King Richards chiefe Counsellors with two others, were taken and two daies after beheaded at Leicester, among them that escaped were Frances Vicount Louell, Humfrey, and Thomas Stafford brethren, which three tooke Sanctuary at S. Iohns in Glocester. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey though he submitted himselfe vnto Henry, yet was hee committed to the Tower and therein a long time remained. Vpon Earle Henries part onely ten men were slaine, as Sir Gilbert Talbot wrote the newes from the field, whereof for note Sir william Brandon was the best, in all to the number of foure thousand men. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of August, and yere of Christ Iesus 1485. in the field Redmore, neere vnto Bosworth, in the Countie of Leicester; after which Earle Henry gaue thankes vnto God, and commending his Souldiers, with sufferance for them to take the spoiles of the field, dubbed many of the knights; which his doings was so acceptable to the whole Army, as with great applause they all cryed King Henry, King Henry; whose forwardnesse to him-ward, when the Lord Stanley perceiued, hee tooke K. Richards Crowne, found among the spoile of the field, and set it vpon the Earle of Richmunds head, thereby confirming the election of the people, at which instant beganne the raigne of this new King.

(59) The slaine body of the vsurping Tyrant, all tugged, and torne, naked, and not so much as a clout left to couer his shame, was trussed behind Blanch Seint-Leger (or White Bore, a Pursuant at Armes,) like a hogge or Calfe, his head and Armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legges on the other, and all besprinckled with mire and bloud, was so brought into Leicester, and there for a miserable spectacle the space of two dayes lay naked and vnburied, his remembrance being as odious to all, as his person deformed, and lothsome to be looked vpon: for whose further despite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from euery Signe, that his monument might perish, as did the monies of Caligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate: Lastly, his body without all funeral solemnity was buried in the Gray-Friers Church of that City. But King Henry his Successor, of a princely disposition, caused afterward his Tombe to bee made with a picture of Alablaster, representing his person, and to be set vp in the same Church, which at the suppression of that Monastery was pulled downe, and vtterly defaced; since when his graue ouergrowne with nettles and weedes, is very obscure and not to be found. Onely the stone chest wherin his corpes lay, is now made a drinking trough for horses at a common Inne, and retaineth the onely memory of this Monarches greatnesse. His body also (as tradition hath deliuered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuously bestowed vnder the end of Bow-Bridge, which giueth passage ouer a branch of Stowre vpon the west side of the Towne. Vpon this Bridge (the like report runneth) stood a stone of some height, against which King Richard, as hee passed toward Bosworth, by chance strucke his spur, and against the same stone as he was brought backe, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken, as a wise woman (forsooth) had foretold, who, before Richards going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre strucke, his head should be broken; but of these things, as is the report, so let be the credite. Dead he is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwixt the Families of Lancaster and Yorke; in whose bandings, to bring, set & keep the Crown on their heades, eight or nine bloudy set battels had beene fought, and no lesse then fourescore persons of the bloud-royall slaine, as Philip Commines the French Writer saith; many of them being wel knowne to himselfe: after which stormes, and this Tirants death, a blessed vnion ensued, by ioining those houses in Henry of Lancaster, and Elizabeth of Yorke.

(60) Hee was of Stature but little, and of shape deformed, the left shoulder bunching out like a Mole-hill on his backe, his haire thinne, and face short, a cruell countenance, in whose aspect might bee perceiued both malice and deceit. When hee stood musing (as hee would doe oft) his vse was, to bite and chaw the nether lip, his hand euer on his dagger, which euer hee would chop vp and down in the sheath, but neuer draw it fully out. Pregnant in wit hee was, wily to faine, apt to dissemble, and haugh-

(61) Anne the ſecond daughter and Coheire to Richard Neuil, the ſtout Earle of Warwicke and Saleſbury, was firſt married to Edward Prince of Wales, the ſonne to King Henry the ſixth, and after his death was remarried to Richard Duke of Glouceſter, Anno 1472. afterwards by vſurpation King of England, with whom in great State and ſolemnity ſhee was Crowned Queene the ſixth of July, and yeere of Saluation, 1483. CHAPTER XX.

HENRIE of that name the ſeauenth, hauing by ſuch mixt meanes of valor and practiſe as are alreadie deſcribed, obtained the poſſeſſion of Englands Crown, we muſt now preſent vnto you his actions in the perſon and ſtate of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was atchieued; to the verification of that rule, That things are kept by the ſame Arts whereby they were gained. In deſcribing whereof, wee meane nothing leſſe, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phraſe and conceit, to mount vp into Panegyricall flouriſhes, in honor of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duely alſo exact them: yet may wee not omit to obſerue, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through diuine prouidence) a concurring diſpoſition of all important Circumſtances, without which his attempt might haue proued diſaſterous; ſo hee, hauing now poſſeſſed the Soueraigne power, and maſtered the State in the maine pointes, eaſily made circumſtances waite vpon his wiſdom, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the firſt kind, wherein his felicity deſerues to be celebrated, were theſe. That he by the Male-line a meere ſtranger to both the roiall houſes, as deſcended from the Welſh and French, and by the female ſpringing out of ſuch a family of Lancaſter (the Beauforts) as by the ſame law which enabled it to inherite in ordinary eſtates, was made incapable of ſucceſſion in the Regalitie, ſhould ſo ſafely be conuaied away into forraine parts, there to continue an head of expectation and reuolt, during ring the inteſtine troubles and dangers, to him ineuitable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of England ſhould bee ſo auerted from Richard, (though a very honorable, wiſe, iuſt and neceſſary Prince, after hee was ſomewhat ſetled) as for his ſake, to neglect (in a ſort) ſo many naturall heires of the houſe of Yorke, ſome of them in right preceding Richard, ſuch were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder brethren, and all of them iuſt barres to the Earle of Richmund, who ſcarce had any thing of a legal title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpoſe to remoue an Vſurper, and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightfull inheritrice. Thirdly, a long and fatall ſlackneſſe of Richard in his warlike preparations, through the meer contempt of his enemy the Earle, which was the cauſe, that both hee landed ſecurely, and Richard was driuen to fight in a manner with tumultuary, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deepely ſuſpected Conſpirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) ſhould haue charge, vnder Richard, ouer a chiefe portion of his Army at the very inſtant of ioyning battell.

* Fabian ſaith, Richard fearing little, prouided little defence.

(2) Theſe conſiderations (among many other) had in them ſuch an aptitude to his deſigne, as no humane wit could faſhion, and without the which a man of equall ſtarres and parts to Henry, or Henry himſelfe, might in vaine haue beene wiſe, in vain, induſtrious and valiant. Circumſtances of the other ſort ſhall plentifully occurre in the whole carriage of his enſuing actions. In both which, are verified two contrary rules; for the ſtate of the firſt obſeruations teacheth vs with Plautus, that Centum doctorum hominum conſilia hæc vna vincit Dea, This one Goddeſſe can effect more, then the wits of an hundred learned men; ſpeaking as an Heathen man of that famous Idole Fortune; and in the ſecond, that which Iuuenall excellently noteth;

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wiſe Prince (which with reaſon ought to bee ſet in front to his actions, as certaine lights of the mind, by which to diſcerne the fountaine of counſels and cauſes) a * learned, eloquent Knight, and principal Lawyer of our time, giues vs many things, of which "theſe ſelected, are very regardable. This King "(ſaith he) attained vnto the Crowne, not onely from a "priuate fortune, which might endew him with a mode- "ration, but alſo from the fortune of an exiled man, "which had quickned in him all the ſeedes of obſeruati- "*on and induſtry. (4) * Another hauing a purpoſe to write in Engliſh the hiſtory of this Henry (an argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wiſe a man as Henry himſelfe,) hath among many extraordinary praiſes (moſt what framed out of his ſtrong affection) truly noted concerning his atchieuement of "the Crowne: That the Almighty hand of God brought "him ouer the toppe of the higheſt and moſt dangerous "obſtacles, to ſway this Scepter, when neither Title, "Power, nor (great) Probability could giue him ſo much "as one ſound puſh to ſet him forward. And of the man "himſelfe, That hee entertained that, as ſodaine, as So- "ueraigne change of fortune, with ſuch moderation, and "vntranſported diſcretion, as it well appeared hee had "throughly conquered himſelfe, before hee ſubdued the "Vſurper his enemy. What could bee added greater to ſo true a prayſe? nothing certainely; for that he (as elſe-where that Writer ſaith) was the Salomon, who brought peace to this Kingdome, long before oppreſſed by warre and tyranny: it was onely an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concurre in the ſame iudgement of him, whom they prayſe * for ſingular wiſdome, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for * policy, iuſtice, and grauity: which princely vertues cauſed him to bee highly reuerenced of forraine Princes. Theſe honourable Eulogies after ſo many yeeres from his death, iuſtly countenance their relations, who * writing, in or about his owne dayes auerre no leſſe; among whom, Bernard Andreas of Tholouz is moſt flowing and abundant. This Andreas (as himſelfe writes) was afterward entruſted with the inſtruction of Prince Arthur (eldeſt ſonne to King Henry) in good letters, though hee was blind; and hauing aſwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Hiſtoriographer, (how hardlie ſoeuer thoſe two faculties meet with honour in the ſame perſon) meant to haue hiſtorified and poetized the Acts of this king, but (for want of competent and attended inſtructions in many places of chiefe importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and vnfiniſhed; yet in ſuch points as he hath profeſſed to know, not vnworthy to bee vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defæcated conceit aboue the ordinary of that age. Hee, among other verſes in honour of this our Henry (whom he enſtyleth the moſt ſapient King) hath theſe not hyperbolicall, but proper, wherein hee ſalutes him,

Princeps ingenio nitente præſtans,
Famâ, religione, comitate,
Senſu, ſanguine, gratiâ, decore.

A peereleſſe Prince for wiſdome rare,
Fame, piety, courteſie, debonaire,
Knowledge, birth, grace, and feature faire.

Whereby alſo, after theſe pourtracts of his inward faculties, and gifts, may be gueſſed that a body they had for their mortall manſion, no way vnſutable; and it ſeemes by that Maieſty (ſo they call the Images of our Kings, which are carried for repreſentation in their funerall Chariots) which at this day is * extant, that hee was of ſtature tall and ſlender, ſomwhat round viſaged, and though in * his childhood ſickly, yet of aſpect in all his outward lineaments, ſo noble and gracious, as well preſaged, and afterward fitted the moſt fortunate height to which he was now aſcended. But notwithſtanding theſe great praiſes, there want not ſome who think him to haue been an heauy Father to the common wealth, which by ſundry courſes he greatly laboured to bring vnder, as a ſeeming ground-worke of his owne, and his poſterities ſecurity. And in his laſt dayes Auarice, (the naturall maladie of age) tooke him ſtrongly, the enuy whereof he partly diuerted from himſelfe by by the ſplendor of ſome few publik buildings, which as they gaue the people cauſe to talke of their braueric, ſo they alſo inſenſibly wrought in their light minds a mittigation of their burthen.

(5) Let vs now behold his vertues as they are ſhiningly deduced into action. After the Battell he hauing truly firſt aſcribed the whole good of his ſucceſſe to God, commanded, that to the body of * his enemy King Richard, an honourable interrement ſhould be giuen in the Friers at Leiceſter, where notwithſtanding * hee was with little reuerence buried. From thence the King made ſpeed to London, as to the chiefe ſeat and Epitome of the Engliſh Monarchie, whithout which no Prince found himſelfe heere ſecure enough: he entred the Citie vpon a * Saturday, as vpon a Saturday he obtained his triumphall and Crowning victory. The Mayor of London and his fellowſhip,* receiued him in violet at Harnſey Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shordich) was honoured with a very great troope of the Peeres, and Nobles in his traine, at which our Poeticall Hiſtorian Andreas was preſent, and ſaluted the victorious Prince with certaine Latine Sapphicks, which he ſung vnto him as himſelfe writeth. But Henry ſtaied not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it ſeemes) hee did purpoſely eſchue, for that (Andreas ſaith) hee entred * couertly, meaning belike, in an Horſe-litter or cloſe Chariot. His lodging was in the Biſhoppe of Londons Pallace, where (after publike offertories and ſolemne thankes giuen to God in the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul) the buſineſſe of his Coronation was ſeriouſlie conſulted of; which was afterward (vpon his remoue to the Tower, where hee * created his vncle Iaſper Earle of Pembroke, Duke of Bedford, and other Eſtates) with due pompe and rituall magnificence * accompliſhed at Weſtminſter.

(6) But the naturall ſolder and indiſſoluble cement, which muſt make this Kingdome ſtand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldeſt daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This as a point of moſt importance was with great maturity and iudgement againe thought vpon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, ſuppoſed to reſide in the perſon of Edward Earle of Warwick (only ſonne and heire, euen in his infelicities, to that vnfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was preuented; for he had beene, by King Henries direction, brought vp priſoner from the Manour of * Sherif-hutton in Yorkſhire, (where aſwell he, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard vnder guard) and immediatly ſhut vp within the Tower of London.

(7) Frances * Duke of Britaine had offered Henrie before his departure to match him with the Ladie Anne his eldeſt daughter and ſole heire, but hee was otherwiſe affected, as placing his loue where it might afford him greateſt & preſenteſt ſtrengths. Andreas addeth, that King Edward himſelfe deſtinated his eldeſt daughter vnto Henry then Earle of Richmund, and ſought in his life time to haue effected it; but his meaning being (belike) ſuſpected, as but a drift to get Henry into his hands, the motion tooke no hold as reſerued till God had cleared the way of all ſuch impediments, as might hinder the conſolidation of both the Royall families, Yorke and Lancaſter, (after their ſo mortall and confuſiue maſſacres) in the perſon of one Soueraigne.

(8) The Lady her ſelfe, beſides youth and beautie (precious Ornaments of that Sexe) had in her from her * infancy a wonderfull feare, and care to pleaſe God, and a like dutieous and humble carriage toward her parents: her brothers and ſiſters ſhee did exceedinglie loue, and as well toward the poore, as all the Seruants of Chriſt, ſhee bare a ſingular affection. * Her Vncle (the late vſurper) in contempt of God and man (whoſe Lawes he was ſo long accuſtomed to violate, till the iuſt reward thereof did at the length ouertake him) inceſtuouſly meant to haue defiled her, vnder the abuſed name of Matrimonie. When therefore the newes of his death came to her eare, the ioy of her heart brake foorth into theſe words. * *So yet at the laſt thou haſt, O God, regarded the humble, and not deſpiſed their praiers. I well remember, neither ſhall I at any time be weary to remember, that my moſt noble Father of famous memory meant to haue beſtowed me in mariage vpon this moſt comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him; but my Father being dead, I want ſuch good friends as ſhould motion ſo great a matter: and perhaps hee will take a wife from forraigne parts, whoſe beauty, age, fortune, and dignity ſhall bee more then mine. What ſhall I ſay? I am all alone, and dare not open my minde to * any. What if I acquainted my mother therewith? Baſhfulneſſe forbids: What if ſame of the Lords? Audacity wanteth. O then that I might but confer with him! perhaps in diſcourſe I might let ſlippe ſuch a word as might diſcouer my intention. What will bee I know not: this I know, that Almighty God cannot tell how to abſent himſelfe from them who truſt in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking, and repoſe my whole hope vpon thee, O my God, doe with mee according to thy mercy.* Shee ſecretly thus reuoluing all matters, and reſoluing of them in her minde, was heard from aboue; for King Henry hauing vnderſtood the honour, chaſtity, and ſingular vertues of the maiden Princeſſe, the rather inclined to make her the Soueraigne of his affections: aſſigning therefore * a day, wherein (for the vtter aboliſhment of all Hoſtilities betweene the two Roiall houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter) to eſtabliſh an vnion of Families by coniunction of their two perſons in marriage.

(9) The meane while he wiſely goes on to ſecure the maine, which conſiſting in ſetling the generall ſtate, and ſecuring his owne perſon, he, for the one, * holds a Parliament at Weſtminſter, and for the other, inſtitutes a certaine number of choiſe * Archers, with allotment of fees and maintenance, which vnder a peculiar Captaine, and the name of Yeoman of the Guard, he aſſigned to that ſeruice, for him and his ſucceſſors, Kings and Queenes of England. In the Parliament was attainted Richard late Duke of Gloceſter, ſtiling himſelfe by vſurpation, King Richard the third; and with him by name many other of the Nobility and Gentry. And yet withall to lay a foundation for his green Gouernment in loue and clemencie, hee, during the Parliament proclaimed free pardon and entire reſtitution of their fortunes, to all ſuch as ſubmitted themſelues to his mercy, and made oath of Fidelity. A ſeaſonbale and neceſſarie Act; Whereby hee greatly weakened malicious humors, and wanne to himſelfe no ſmall acceſſion of friendſhip and ſeruices; for many forſooke Sanctuaries, and tooke vp their refuges in his goodneſſe and moſt gracious fauour. And to remoue all ſcandall and danger from his friends, he reuerſed and reuoked all former Acts, hurtfull either to himſelfe, or to them for his cauſe, the whole houſe of Parliament, * concurring finally in eſtabliſhing by a ſolemne Act, the Crowne vpon him, and his heires for euer.

(10) After diſſolution of which Parliament, the King redeemes ſuch pledges, as he had left in France for money borrowed, and aſſumes into his Councel thoſe two renowned agents in aduancing his fortunes, Iohn Morton and Richard Foxe, as the moſt neceſſarie parts and ſupports of his State; the former of which, not long after (Thomas Bourchier dying) was elected and enthronized Archbiſhop of Canterbury; the latter, was foorthwith aduanced to be Lord Keeper of his Priuy Seale, & ſucceſſiuely preferred to the Biſhoprickes of Exeter, Bath and Welles, Durham, and Wincheſter.

(11) The moſt wiſhed and moſt welcome * day of marriage betweene King Henry and the Princeſſe Elizabeth being now come, was celebrated by them with all religious and glorious magnificence, and by the people, with * fires of ioy, dancings, ſongs and bankets through London, all ſorts and ſexes beſeeching

(12) Meanewhile there were not a few who did enuie to King Henry this vnexpected height of felicitie; but they who firſt diſcouered themſelues, were certaine remaines of the late ouerthrow at Boſworth, whoſe diffidence, or euill will, was greater then to relie vpon King Henries clemencie, or to behold the dazeling brightnes of his new atchieued glorie; and for that cauſe refuſed to forſake the Sanctuarie, which they had taken at Colcheſter. Theſe were the Lord Louell, Sir Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, ſecure of dangers behind him, was in his Progreſſe at Yorke, meaning by affability, bountie and other his wiſeſt courſes, to gaine the good wils of the Northern people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and ſo to weaken the ſtrengths and hopes of all future conſpiracies, forſooke their refuge, and ſecretly in ſeuerall places gathered forces, therewith to ſurprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Louell raiſed his forces with ſuch ſpeed, that the King who at Lincolne firſt heard of his eſcape, and lightly regarded the ſame, was no ſooner ſetled in Yorke, but certaine intelligence came that he approched faſt with an Armie; and withall, that the Staffords had aſſembled forces in Worceſterſhire, meaning to aſſault the City of * Worceſter. The extremity of the King (who neuer dreamt of ſuch a darling) was not ſmall, for neither had he any ſufficient numbers about him of his ſure friends, nor could iuſtly repoſe confidence in the Northern men, whoſe loue to King Richard their late ſlaine Lord, made them ſtill ſuſpected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore vpon due recollection of himſelfe, hee armes about three thouſand men, (if tanned leather, whereof the moſt of their breaſt-pieces, for want of other ſtuffe, were framed, may be called armour) and ſends them vnder the leading of Iaſper Duke of Bedford, with commiſſion to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Louell fled by night to* Sir Thomas Broughton into Lancaſhire, where hee lurked certaine monthes; the headleſſe multitude yeeld without ſtroake, and the felicity of King Henry preuailes in euery place; for the Staffords hearing what had hapned to their Confederates, diſperſe their Cloude of rebels, and ſpeedily take refuge at Colnham a village about two miles from Abingdon in Oxfordſhire. But the priuiledges of that place * being iuridically ſcand in the Kings Bench, they were found vnable to afford protection to open traitors, whereupon they were forceably taken thence, and conueighed to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humfrey Stafford was drawne and executed at Tiburne, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. Theſe ſhort dangers and troubles, by reaſon of their ſuddainty did worthily make the King wakefull euen ouer ſmaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from ſo neglected ſparkles. But there followed deuiſes, which in their owne nature were ſo ſtrangely impudent, and in their vent ſo ſtrongly bolſtered, that if Louels enterpriſe made him ſuſpitious, theſe other might iuſtly fill him with innumerable iealouſies.

(13) The records are immortall, which teſtifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in poſſeſſion, is a verie olde Stratagem. What troubles a Pſeudo-Nero wrought, by ſupport of the Parthians (who wonderfully fauoured Nero liuing,) the Romane writers teach vs. Neither hath the Diuell (Father of Impoſtures) any ſo ſolemne practiſe, as Perſonation and Reſemblances of true, whether men or things. Inſomuch that ſome Diuines haue thought, that as he can, and often doth tranſ-ſhape himſelfe into the forme of a Celeſtiall Angell, ſo that he alſo deceiued our firſt mother vnder that reſplendent but aſſumed habit. And what miſchiefs he wrought, in this very kind of thruſting out into the world falſe pretenders, the ſpeech of wiſe* Gamaliel teſtifieth, who rehearſeth the names of Theudas and Iudas Galilaus; but the world hath ſince had more woefull experience hereof, in that execrable Impoſtor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Meſsiah. In England it ſelfe (before the time of this Henry) what ſtrange practiſes and conſpiracies were ſet on foote vnder the title of a Pſeudo-Richard in the raigne of Henry the fourth, the former Hiſtories haue ſufficiently opened, ſo that this Prince encountred nothing new in the Generall, howſoeuer peſtilent and extraordinarie in the particular. Indeed his raigne (more perhaps then any other of his predeceſſors) afforded plentifull matter for ſuch deuiſes to worke vpon, there being many then, who hauing beene* conceaued (as it were) in the bowels of Sedition, and nouriſhed with the bitter and pernicious milke of diſſention, were not onely apt to embrace, but alſo, where they were not offered, euen there to beget occaſions of confounding all. *Men, who could neither endure warre, nor peace long, nor any lawes in either, as deſirous to enioy the licentious violences of ciuill warre; a miſery, which all wordes (how wide ſoeuer) want compaſſe to expreſſe*. The ſtrange attempts of which kind of men (or rather Monſters) wee ſhall ſee exemplified in the ſubſequent tragedies. Richard Simon, an ambitious and impoſterous wretch, and withall a Prieſt, neither vnlearned, (the ſacred ſhadow of which name the rather countenanced his practiſes) in hope to make himſelfe the principall Biſhop of England, plotted the aduancement of Lambert Symnell (being his pupill in the Vniuerſitie of Oxford) to the Crown of England; inſtigated thereto by the diuell, and ſuborned by ſuch as fauoured the White-roſe faction, vpon this occaſion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwicke, ſonne and heire to George the late vnfortunate Duke of Clarence, ſecond brother of King Edward, was either already murthered, or ſhould ſhortly be*. This Architect of guile, Simon hauing this Symnel in tuition, (the ſonne of a Baker, or Shoomaker, but a wel-faced and Princely-ſhaped youth, of no very euill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) meanes out of this rumors aerie ſubſtance, to produce an apparition and prodigie, which in Title, behauiour, and artificiall anſwers (infuſed by his Tutors practiſes) ſhould reſemble * one of King Edwards children. Here we muſt confeſſe that our authors leade vs into a perplexitie: Some* affirming, that this counterfet was exhibited to the world vnder the name of Edward Earle of Warwick, ſonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the moſt turbulent and fatall Earle of Warwicke ſlaine at Barnet-field. But hereunto reaſon ſeemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman haue, not onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the indubitate eldeſt daughter and heire of King Edward the fourth, and ſiſter and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither wants there ancienter authority then any of the others, affirming, that this Idoll did vſurpe the name of one of King Edwards ſonnes; many arguments concurring to buttreſſe this affirmation. For, if at the the ſame time (as Polydor writeth) it was bruted, that the ſonnes of King Edward the fourth had not been murthered vnder their vſurping Vncle Richard, but were eſcaped, and liued in obſcurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stow and the reſt (who follow Polydore therein) affirm, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what iniurie to the roiall brethren (fained to be aliue) was that? Verily there ſeemes no coherence in the circumſtances, nor apparence of truth in the ſubſtance. And how much ſtronger to the purpoſe of the Conſpirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings ſonne, and himſelfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarences heire? But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other? then that by rumoring his murther, they might bring the perſon of King Henry into common deteſtation for his crueltie; for clearing whereof the King publikelie afterward ſhewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet * one who then liued, ſaith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed & mounted from his owne meane ranke to the title of a King, vnder the name of the ſecond brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, is to vs as yet vnknowne; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly paſſe with a Iury of ordinary Criticks, and Cenſors for vnchallengeable euidence.

(14) This aery Typhon (which graſped at the embracement of the two Kingdomes of England and Ireland) thus throughly ſchooled and inſtructed, is ſecretly conueighed by his Sinonian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Iriſh, where he was confident of partakers, as amongſt the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the houſe of Yorke; which affection was firſt breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of Yorke, the firſt of that line, who publikely claimed the Engliſh Crowne. His hopes deceiued him not, for the Lord * Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald (of the noble Familie of the Geraldines) preſently profeſſed himſelfe for the plot, and by his authority and perſwaſions drew the generality of the Iriſh after him into it. Meſſengers are hereupon diſpatched, vpon all hands both into England, to ſuch as they had hope of, and into low Germany to the Lady Margaret, ſiſter of King Edward the fourth, Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundy, a moſt mortall enemy of the Lancaſtrian family. In both places the lighted matches of ſedition found powdry ſpirits, and wonderfull correſpondence. There is flocking from all parts to ſupport the quarrell, and the Iriſh (to haue the glory of giuing England a King) proclaim & reuerence this painted puffe, & flying bubble with royall Style and honors.

(15) Henrie ſeeing the fire ſo ſtrangely kindled round about the wals of his beſt hopes & ſtrengths, fals ſeriouſly to counſell at the Monaſtery of Carthuſian Monkes neere Richmund, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, 1. That general pardon (to ſtay the minds of as many as it was poſſible) ſhould without any exception bee proclaimed to ſuch as from thenceforth ſhould continue dutifull. Which was principally done to temper, and aſſure ſome priuate perſons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whoſe forces, willes, and wealth were held moſt in ſuſpition. 2. That Elizabeth late wife to Edward the fourth, and mother in law to Henry now King of England, ſhould forfeit all her lands and goods for that (contrary to her faith giuen to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) ſhe had yeelded vp her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwicke then Priſoner in the Tower, ſhould bee openly ſhewed aliue in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for ſtill the plot went on.

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather moued enuy towards Henry, then relieued his cauſe; for to many the iuſtice of that ſentence was doubtful, the circumſtance of a mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the iudgement it ſelfe did alſo want example. The iuſtice was doubtfull both in regard of the cauſe, and of the proceeding. Of the cauſe, for how could ſhee haue defended her daughters by the priuiledge of ſanctuary from ſuch a Wolfe and Tyger, as would haue infringed it for her ſons, had they not been quietly deliuered to his bloudie hands? The ſame Tyrant doth now demand her daughters as to honour, not to ſlaughter; but if it had beene to ſlaughter, what helpe? ſhe, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yeelds them to him, when ſhee neither could, nor durſt detain them. But you ſay ſhe violated her faith, and hazarded thereby the liues and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cauſe. A great crime certainely. But Richard was in title, and power a King, and hung ouer her head with inceitable terrors; when Henry of Richmund was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in baniſhment, and without any apparence of preuailing, and her ſelfe a friendleſſe widdow. The manner or proceeding was no leſſe ſtrange; for by what law or triall was ſhee condemned in a Præmunire? Shee neuertheleſſe is put out of all, and confined to the Monaſtery of Bermondſey in Southwarke, where finally ſhe ended her dayes, borne to bee an example of both fortunes, hauing from a forlorne widdowes eſtate beene raiſed to the bed of a Bachelour Monarcke; and in his life time beene reduced to the ſeeming of a priuate fortune, when her Lord was driuen to flie the land; and afterward ſaw thoſe turnes and varieties as few Queenes euer felt, or ſaw ſo many, or more contrarie; whether we regard the heighth of worldly felicity, when ſhee did behold her ſonne a King, or the depth of miſery, when the Tyrant inuaded his Crowne and life, or now her daughter being Queene, and her ſelfe a miſerable priſoner. The conſideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections; ſo the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſentence verifies that collection among others, which *that learned Gentleman makes of this Kings raigne in theſe words. Hee had (ſaith hee) a very ſtrange kind of interchanging very large and vnexpected pardons with ſeuere executions. Neuertheleſſe, (his wiſdome conſidered) it could not be imputed to any inequality, but to a diſcretion, or at leaſt to a principle, that hee had apprehended, that it was not good, obſtinately to purſue one courſe, but to trie both wayes. Howſoeuer that was; certainely, ſhee being ſo iuſt an obiect of his commiſeration, who had married that daughter, by which hee enioyed a Kingdome, and gotten that verie power, wherewith he ruined her; it cannot bee reaſonably thought, but that there were other moſt important motiues, perſwading ſuch a ſharpe courſe, or otherwiſe, that it muſt bee reckoned among the chiefe of his errors. But as in the times of her flouriſhing eſtate, ſhe founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of her is called the Queenes; ſo we will leaue to thoſe her Beneficiaries the farther ſearch of this Argument, and deploration of her fortune, which ſeemes ſuch to vs, as if King Henry affected to leaue ſomewhat in this example, wherewith to oppoſe & amaſe the world. Vnleſſe perhaps it were, that hauing proclaimed a generall pardon for all offences without exception to ſuch as in future ſhould remaine loyall, and foreſeeing that ſome, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefite, might alſo bee cunningly practiſed with to fall away, vpon diſtruſt of his word, when once hee had ſerued his preſent vſes, hee therefore meant (by ſo cleare a demonſtration, as the vtter vndoing, and perpetuall empriſonment of his wiues owne mother,) to giue them aſſurance, that hee, who vpon her perſon had beene ſo ſeuere a puniſher of faith-breach, would neuer violate it in his own, and thereby ſecure them in that point, and ſecure himſelfe of them.

John de la Pole Earle of Lincolne and others, flie to the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy.

(17) Yet neither could this deuiſe take ſo good effect, but that Iohn Earle of Lincolne (ſonne of Iohn de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths ſiſter) ſecretly fled into Flanders to the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Louell was likewiſe not long before eſcaped. Sir Thomas Broughton (another principal Confederate) temporized in England, there to remaine a ſtay to the buſineſſe, aſwell for mutuall intelligence, as receit of an Army when it ſhould arriue. This Earle of Lincolne, beſides that he could not with any patience behold a Lancaſtrian weilding the Engliſh Scepter; was alſo of a ſharpe wit, and high reach*, and therefore not without an ambitious ſenſibility, that in countenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectancie, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his mother, ſiſter to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had * deſigned him for heire apparant, & contracted his ſiſter the * Lady Anne de la Pole, to Iames Prince of Scotland: was alſo the rather animated by *letters receiued from his aunt the Dutcheſſe of Burgundy, earneſtly calling vpon him for his preſence. This Dutcheſſe was the ſecond wife of Charles Duke of Burgundie, * ſlaine by the Switz at the battell of Nanci; by whom thogh he had no iſſue, yet by reaſon of her great dower, & wiſe behauiour among the Dutch, ſhee was ſtrong in money and friends; all which ſhee was willing to conuert to the vtter ſubuerſion howſoeuer of the Lancaſtrian line. Though therefore, ſhee well knew that this Lambert was but an Idoll, * hammered out of the hote braine of that Bontefew Richard Simon, yet ſhe embraceth the occaſion, countenanceth the Impoſture, and leaues nothing vnſaid or vndone, which might giue life and ſucceſſe to the enterpriſe. The Earle, the L. Louell, and others ſhee furniſhed abundantly, and ioyneth vnto them a renowmed Coronell Martin Swart, a Gentleman of * honorable birth, exemplary valour, and ſingular experience, and certain ſelected companies, to the number of about two thouſand Almaines, which ſoone after arriue at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Chriſts Church there ſolemnly by them crowned King of England, *feaſting and triumphing, rearing mighty ſhowtes and cries, carrying him thence to the kings Caſtell vpon tall mens ſhoulders, that he might be ſeene and noted; as hee was ſurely (ſaith Stow) an honourable boy to look vpon; though nothing leſſe was meant, then that hee ſhould enioy that honour if they preuailed; as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwicke. Poſterity might worthily doubt of the truth of theſe ſo deſperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practiſed in the higheſt affaires of mankind, but that the thing is ſo vniuerſally teſtified, and alſo that the higheſt affairs of the world (when once they are paſſed) are little better then ſuch like Pageants.

(19) The King then at Couentree, being by ſuch ſcowtes as hee had appointed for that ſeruice, preſently aduertiſed of Lamberts arriuall, and hauing his forces ready vnder the conduct of Iaſper Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Oxford, becauſe delay in this caſe was on all hands reputed miſchieuous, ſets forward to Nottingham, and by a wood ſide called Bowri, encampeth his people; in whom there appeared a gallant forwardneſſe to reuenge themſelues by the ſword of that indignity, which was offered to the Engliſh name by ſtrangers and rebels, who durſt hope to giue them a ruler. Thither repaired George Talbot Earle of Shrewsbury, George L. Strange his ſon, Sir Iohn Cheinie, and other noble and valiant Gentlemen with their numbers, which added no ſmall ſinewes to K. Henries muſters. Polydor hath diligently ſet downe the names of ſuch principall men in thoſe parts as repaired thither, partly voluntary, partly ſent for to the common defence of the King and Kingdome; but without due additions of each mans degree and place of precedency; yet their names doe well deſerue to be remembred, both for the honour of their Families, and examples of loyalty. He recounteth ſixty fiue Captaines which aſſembled from places thereabout, vnder whome there cannot probably be thought fewer Souldiers then eight or ten thouſand, the Engliſh vſually, till of late, hauing commonly an hundreth and fifty in a Company. Their ſurnames (beſides Edward Lord * Haſtings) are in him as followeth; Longford, Montgomerie, Vernon of the Peke, Shurley, Folgeham, Griſley, Sutton, Stanley, and Stanley, Houghton, Meryng, Stanhop, Clifton, Stapleton, Willoughby, Perpoinct, Babington, Bedyll, Brudenel*, Markham, Merbury, Borough, Tyrwit, Huſey, Shefeild, Newport, Ormeſton, Tempeſt, Knyuett, Willoughby, Dygby, and Dygby, Harrington, Sacheuerel, Vyllers, Fylding, Poultney, Vaux, Gryne, Gryffin, Lucy, Belknap, Throgmorton, Gray of Ruthin, Wolſton, Fynder, Philips, Cheney, Cotton, *S. The Earle of Lincolne neuertheleſſe comes forward with his Counter-king, nothing perhappes adding greater courage to that ſide, then the example of Henry himſelfe, who with leſſe numbers (but much more ſecret Art) preuailed in a pight field at Boſworth: his meaning was to get into Newarke. The King wakefull vpon all aduantages, and perfectly inſtructed of his enemies courſes (whom deſperation did thruſt forward to a daring hope) diſlodgeth with his Army, & paſſeth through Newarke, leauing it behind him about 3. miles, to intercept the Lambertines, and there ſits downe againe. The Earle of Lincolne encamps with great brauerie and ſhew of courage in the face of the Kings forces.

(20) The next day both the Armies are brought forth to fight, neere to a little village called Stoke. The Earle of Lincolne marſhalled his people by the aduiſe of of Cornwall Swart and others, to the best aduantage vpon the a Brow or hanging of an hill expecting the charge. The Almaines were all of them hardie and approued men, and throughly well-appointed, and so in likelihood were such English as stood for that side; but the Irish, besides multitudes and fiercenesse, had small prouision, saue (after the rude manner of their Nation) darts, skeins, or the like. The maine of the Battell rested wholly vpon the English and Almains. King Henry on the other side, (as hee that thirsted for an end of this bloody daies worke,) speedily disposed his whole numbers into three Battailions: the Voward whereof was best replenished with store of choice and picked men, well armed and appointed, and fortified with wings. The armie being thus ordered, Andreas saith that King Henry vseth this speech.

"(21) Most faithfull Lords, and you most valiant "Companions in Armes, who haue (together with "vs) endured so great perils by Land and Sea; lo, "we are againe against our wils, drawne to trie our "fortunes in another Field. For the Earle of Lin-"colne (a periured man) without any occasion mini-"stred by vs, defends an vniust quarrell against vs: "neither doth he it dissemblingly, but most openly "impudent, without any feare of God; not so much "onely to endamnage vs, as to fulfill the humor of a "giddie, and intemperate-tongued woman, who is "not ignorant that her blood was extinguished by "her brother Richard; but because that line did al-"waies maintaine a most deadly fewd against ours, "shee (without any great regard to her Neece, my "deerest Consort) assaies to destroy aswell vs as our "posteritie. Yee see therefore how often wee are "prouoked by them, but they shall not carrie it a-"way vnreuenged. God therefore and his holy An-"gels we first call to witnes, that we are prouident "both night and day for your safetie, and for the "Common quiet; though thus the ancient enemy "repugneth. But God, a iust, strong, and patient "Iudge, will also bring a remedy to this euill. In the "meane time we exhort and admonish you, that the "consideration of our iust inheritance be at this pre-"sent more forceable with you, then their wicked-"nes; neither doubt, but that the same God, who in "the former warre made vs victorious, will enable "vs to triumph now also ouer these enemies. Let vs "therefore set vpon them courageously; for God is "vpon our side to assist vs.

(22) The Earle of Oxford (on the behalfe of the whole Army) was prepared to make answere, but the King hastening to the proofe, brake off all Ceremonies; and the signe of Battell giuen, they thunder forward with showts of people, and sound of martiall musicke, and like a blacke tempest, powre themselues vpon the Front of the Enemies Battels; who rushed forward with equall violence and furie, as men that at once encountred against feare and fortune. The fight continued doubtfull aboue *three houres. A long space for men of courage to be emploied in killing one the other, and fit to glut the hunger of furie. The Earles English wanted nothing but a good cause, and the Almains gaue not place to the Kings people in any point worthy of gallant Souldiers, but sold their liues dearely, and their Corenell Swart had scarce any before him in personall performance. Neither were the Irish behind for their parts, if their skinnes had beene sword-proofe, for the contempt of death was alike in them as the rest. Briefly, the wonder of that daies worke was, that Christian men, in no sounder a quarrell, could dare to die so boldly, such chiefly, as the Earle of Lincolne and some others, who knew the secret of that desperate enterprize. But God, the Lord of reuenges, punishing their vniust malice, with a suddaine whirle-winde rising in the heat of the Battell, (euen as when Constantine fought against the Enemies of the Church) our souldiers, who seemed vanquished, became victorious For the Kings vantgard * reenforced it selfe, and gaue so furious a recharge, (in likelihood vpon this encouragement sent as it were from Heauen) that it vtterly brake the Enemies squadrons, and giuing in among them with full randon, slew * first such Captaines as relisted, and put the residue which yeelded not, either to the sword flight. Herewith the whole Armie * shouted, the trumpets sound victorie, and the generall crie runnes King Henry, King Henry. When the battell and chase were ended, so that there was time and leasure to view the field, it then appeared what mindes the slaine bodies carried; for all the chiefe Captaines; the Earle of Lincolne himselfe (though the King would gladly haue had him saued, to come thereby to a greater light of his dangers) the Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Corenell Swart and * Maurice Fitz-Thomas, Generall of the Irish, were (like * Catiline and his Complices) found to couer those places dead, which they defended liuing, among foure thousand other souldiers which were slaine vpon that side. The King at this battell lost * almost halfe the People in his Vantgard, and Surgeons had store of worke among the Suruiuers, so that the Garland gained at this iourney was not vndipt in blood; Howbeit there is no mention that any man of honor or speciall note, fell vpon the Kings side.

(23) Among the Prisoners was the Counterfeit himselfe, and the lewd contriuer of this wicked Stratagem, Richard Simon, who with little change may most truly be called another Sinon. The King (who reserued himselfe in this battell, (as in others, but *neuer retired) made both their persons examples of his clemency. For Lambert being questioned, how *such a breeching-boy as he was, durst attempt so great a wickednes, diuied not, that hee was compelled thereunto, by certaine bad persons, who were of that conspiracie; and as for his parents quality, hee confest them to bee such as indeed they were; altogether of base and despicable calling. Sim* subtil, or Sir Richard Simon the Priest, whether for discouery of some great secrets, or the extraordinary reuerenee borne to his function (extraordinary say we, for otherwise * Priests had beene openly put to death) was not executed, but * condemned to a dungeon, and perpetuall shackles. Lambert (whom the glittering periwig of regall style did but lately so adorne) was condemned to * the Kings kitchen, there to manage spits at the fire; who if his wit and spirit had answered his late Titles, would haue chosen much rather to haue beene turned from the Ladder by an hangman. But * hauing in this abiect condition giuen sufficient proofe that he was but a Puppet, or a property in the late tragicall motion, he was at length (promoted wee cannot say) made one of the Kings Falconers*, in which estate it seemes he liued and died inglorious. This battell was fought vpon a* Satterday, a day of the weeke which is * obserued to haue been fauourable and luckie to this Henrie. His first care after the victory setled, was that which most became a religious Prince, the humble and ioyous acknowledgement of thankes to God, in the very place. From thence he passeth to * Lincoln, where he spent three daies in publike supplications, processions, and thanksgiuings, and sent his Standard to our Ladies Church at Walsingham in Norfolke, there to remaine as a Monument of his victorie and gratitude. Such as were taken in the Battell or chase, are then executed. From Lincoln he progresseth into Yorkeshire, where hee tooke a seuere course aswell by execution, as ransome, for purging those parts from such as were culpable, or probably dangerous. At Newcastle about * the middle of August, he dispatcheth his experienced and trusty Agent Richard Fox Bishop of Exceter, and Sir Richard Edgcumbe Knight into Scotland, there to settle a peace with King Iames the third, to empeach the retreat and protection, which his enemies and rebels found therein. Himselfe hauing spent a great part of Summer in this progresse, or rather itinerary Iusticing, returnes by Leicester toward London. Those prudent Ambassadors sadors in the meane time negociating with the Scottish King, wrought * him to bee more inclinable to a perpetuall peace; then it stood with his safetie to let his Subiects vnderstand, who fauoured him not. Seuen yeeres truce is consented vnto, with a secret promise of King Iames to renew that terme, as it began to expire; with which assurance the Ambassadours returning, gladded their wise Soueraignes heart; who thereby found that the Bishop of Excester, was no lesse industrious in preseruing his Regall state, then he had beene prudent in furthering Him vnto it. The firebrands and readiest fuell of Rebellion thus seemed to be quenched, and the King beholds himselfe in the Grace and fauour of his people, nor lesse of forreigne Princes, Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy (his implacable* Iuno) excepted; whom the newes of her Nephewes the Earle of Lincolnes death, and the bloody blowing vp of all her late hopefull and costly contriuements, did gall and wound extreamely; but added fresh appetites of reuenge to her former immortall malice, which * neuer gaue ouer working, till shee had vented another no lesse prodigy then Lambert was. But the King being honoured and sought vnto, aswell by a Nuncio * from the Romane See, who obtained leaue to publish a Croisado heere against the Turkes, as also from the French; after his many labours, aswell Martiall as Ciuill, susteined on behalfe of himselfe and the Common-weale, makes a triumphall * entric into London, which was adorned in the best manner. (24) The next maine action which sifted the iudgement, and tride the sinnewes of King Henry, was a forraigne case of more difficulty and Art, then of intestine danger, as in which the high and paramount respects of Common-weale were intangled, or encountred with offices most neerely concerning the honour of a Princes minde, which neuer is more blemished then with the note of ingratitude. A dispute and combate betweene wisdome and blood, publike and priuate, (if any quality, or action of a King may be said to be priuate) which seemed worthy of so excellent, cleare, and considerate a discourse, as that of Henries. You heard what notable fauours and humanities, when he liued a banisht Earle in the Continent, he had receiued, first of the Duke of Britaine, then of Charles K. of France; so that he stood equally (as it were) obliged to them both, & could acknowledge no lesse. Charles (more ambitiously then iustly) desired exceedingly to annex Britaine to the Crowne of France, taking occasion of the time, and other circumstances, which all seemed to conspire with his affections. The Duke old, and the father of one onely daughter suruiuing till marriage; Maximilian King of Romans, and riuall of King Charles in the same desires, (aswell for the Dutchy, as the daughter,) feeble in meanes; and King Henry alwell obnoxious to the French for benefits, as busied in his particular at home: and the Duke of Britane, by succouring Lewis Duke of Orleance, and other French Lords, whom King Charles reputed his aduersaries, ministred to the French an occasion (or colour at least) of warring vpon Britaine, and so by the apt concurrence of circumstances, to annexe it by conquest, if by treaty hee could not. Henrie of England, now knowne to bee victoriously setled, seemes worth the Courting. Ambassadors come from the French, who lay open the wrong offered by the Britaines, in succouring the enemies of France, put Henrie in minde of passed benefits; and pray his assistance, or at the least a neutrality; but altogether concealing the mystery of this warre, which was to annexe Britaine to the Crowne of France. Howsoeuer, Henry, though he well enough knew, that a King must euer bee the best part of his Councell, (for what are others opinions, if himselfe want the happinesse, or iudgement, to choose the best?) propounds the points to his priuy Councell, whereupon he Christianly offers himselfe a Mediatour betweene the French and Britaine; an office, in which it was apparant he might best satisfie all obligations and duties both to God and them. The French pretend liking, but in the meane time follow their designe hard. Henry sends his Chaplen, Master Christopher Yrswicke a man * whom he very often imploied. The French maske on. Things come to some extremities. It becomes manifest that King Charles abused the King of Englands credulity; for the City of Nants in Britaine was brought by siedge to point of yeelding, while messengers, and packets, outwardly oiled with the name of peace, slide to and fro, and the French doubt nothing so much, as lest the English should stirre, before their victorie had made Britain irrecouerable. The Lord Woodvile (as without the Kings will, or priuity) slips ouer into Britaine with three or foure hūdred choise men to assist the Duke, and came time enough to bee slaine with almost all his Souldiers, at the battel of Saint Albin, where the French wanne the day; notwithstanding that the Britains, the rather to appall their enemies, had apparelled * seuenteene hundred of their owne Souldiers in white Coates with redde Crosses, after the English manner, and made thereby a shew of two Regiments of English. The Britaines had a great losse in that battel, wherein they were made fewer by sixe thousand. The Duke of Orleance and Prince of Orange, who then were British in faction, were taken Prisoners in the same fight. The French lost about twelue hundreth, and their Generall an Italian. So that the state of Britaine seemed ripe for a fall.

(25) But King Henry, hauing long since suspected, and foreseene, what the vttermost marke of the French might be, and seeming to haue enough suffered the interest, which they might expect in him as a man, to be abused by their practises to the preiudice of his other friend, the Duke of Britaine, (who forgate not to sollicit and vrge that point,) had made the quality of this affaire known to the body of State in open Parliament, for that purpose assembled; as meaning by authority thereof to purge himselfe from all imputation, if, as a King, he did that which the reason of Gouernment required, which would not assent, that Britaine should be made French, left by that accession their Neighbourhood might grow intollerable, Britaine hauing so many Sea-townes and Outlets to mischiefe the English trafficke. Himselfe was otherwise also sufficiently resolued, that the general good ought to predominate the particular, and that his priuate obligations ought not to entangle, or preiudice the publike seruice. The Parliament therefore, considering that which stood for the Common-weale, decrees aide of men and money, on behalfe of the Duke of Britaine; it being (besides all other respects) a perillous example, to suffer the great to deuoure the lesser Neighbour States, vpon pretences of iustice, or reuenge. Forces are leuied; but (for respect of King Charles, and in hope that the shew of preparations would stoope him to equall conditions,) not yet so roundlie, as the Britons necessities expected. Meane while that no formality or Princely Ceremony should be vnaccomplished, King Henry by his Ambassadours certifies King Charles of his Parliaments decree; praies him to desist from farther Hostilitie; otherwise that he must assist the Duke, but yet (for the French Kings sake) with this reseruation, of pursuing his subiects no where but in Britaine. Charles made small account of these ouertures, because hee truly perswaded himselfe that the English aides would not arriue in season; which fell out accordingly; for before that time, the French had gotten that victorie, (whereof euen now wee spake) at the Battell of Saint Albin. Vpon newes whereof, the English Regiments were immediatly sent ouer vnder Robert Lord

Broke Generall, Sir Iohn Cheiny, Sir Iohn Middleton, Sir Ralfe Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Lewes, and Sir Edmund Carewell Knights, and Coronels. The whole Army consisted eight thousand men. These march toward the enemy; who, acquainted with the temper of the English, whiles they are fresh, as * being then almost invincible, containe themselues within their Campe; but yet * molest the English with continuall skirmishes on horseback in seueral places at once; finally to the profit of the French, who * were alwaies put to the worse, the Archers receiued them with such perpetuall stormes. In the meane space, Francis Duke of Britaine dies, leauing in effect, one only daughter, the Lady Anne, (for the other, * being the younger) deceased not long after. This altered the whole state of the cale. The British Nobility (vnder their young Mistresse) immediatly fall at variance among themselues, and the English thereby were on euery hand in danger: so that God (as it appeared by the sequele) had destined Britaine to bee annexed to the Crowne of France; for the English (after fiue moneths stay) were in wisdome compelled to returne; the rather, for that Winter now was come vpon them, and Britaine, destitute of competent defence, (her Rulers disagreeing among themselues) was finally by the marriage of King Charles with the Lady Anne, made a parcell of the French Monarchy, as hereafter will appeare.

(26) King Henry the while was againe in danger to haue had present vse of Souldiers at home. Wee shewed, what care was heeretofore taken by him to weede the North, and free it from lurking enemies. That notwithstanding, when the Earle of Northumberland, (Lieutenant of the North) signified at an assemblie (according as the truth was) that the King (though the Northern people had besought it) would not remitte one penny of such Subsidy, as was granted in Parliament for supportation of the warres in Britaine * lest the Acte of State should bee reuersed at the rude peoples pleasure; but that on the contrary Commission and warrant was sent downe for him to see the same leuied by distresse, or otherwise: the desperate multitude, falsely supposing that the Earle was the occasion of such an answere, did suddenly set vpon him at the incitement of one Iohn a Chamber, and furiously murdered him, with certaine of his seruants in a place called Cocklegge by Thrusk, eighteene miles from Yorke. They to carry their wicked attempt through, make head vnder Sir Iohn Egremond, a discontented Knight of those parts, openly declaring where they came, that their meaning was to fight with the King in defence of their liberties, as if the causelesse killing of a most noble Lord had beene one of them. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey sent from Court with some forces to represse their increase, skirmisheth with a route of these Rebels, beats them away, and takes Iohn a Chamber prisoner. The whole swarme flockes to Yorke, where they roosted about three or foure daies, when hearing of the Kings approach (who was euer one of the first in the necke of such occasions) they scattered themselues, but the ring-leaders were hanged and quartered, and Iohn a Chamber, with some others, were executed at Yorke after an extraordinarie manner. Sir Iohn Egremond escaping, fled to the common Center of all King Henries dangers and enmities, Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundy; so that though the colour of rising was about money, yet Egremond at left had reference, it seemes, to the generall perturbation of the Kingdome, vpon the old ground of quarrell (hatred of the Lancastrian Familie) and this to bee but a sparke or flash of that great and troubleous fire, which afterward brake foorth and blased so prodigiously. The Earle of Surrey is left by the King (hauing * seuerely punished the murtherers) Lieutenant of the North, and Sir Robert Tonstall Knight, as chiefe Commissioner for leuying the rate or subsidie.

(27) [illegible] King Henry, as also with the Pope, and King of France, to make an accord betweene him and his Mutinadors, for that they had compelled Prince Iames, his sonne, to be the leader and vnnaturall Head of those armes, which traiterously (as pretending to haue a right on behalfe of the Common-weale to depose an euill King) they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by earnest Ambassadors, but could obtaine no other then this outragious answer: That there was no talking of peace vnlesse he would resigne his Crowne. King Henry and King Charles vehemently protested against these their whole proceedings, declaring by their Ambassador, that they thought the same to be as a common iniury done vnto themselues; & the example to be very wicked and pernicious, and not sufferable by Princes, that Subiects should be permitted to put hands vnto their Soueraigne. Hereupon it came to a Battell at Bannocksborn by Stripelin, whereat K. Iames (rashly fighting before his whole numbers were come) was (notwithstanding the contrarie commandement of the Prince his sonne) slaine in the Mill of that Field, whither he fled after the battel ended. By reason of this infortunate precipitation of the Scotish King, Hadrian de Castello an Italian Legate, whom Pope Innocentius the eight had sent to take vp the cruell quarrell, came too late, (for he arriued not in England till the battell at Bannocksborne was passed,) but not too late to receiue honour at the hands of King Henry, who respecting his wisdome and excellent learning, (vpon the speciall commendations first * of Iohn Morton Archbishop of Canterburie, but afterward vpon his owne experience of the man in sundry employments to the Roman Sea,) bestowed vpon him the Bishoprike of Hereford, and (after resignation thereof) the Bishopricke of Bath and Wellet; who was also at the length created Cardinall by Pope Alexander the sixth. * But who is hee among many thousands (saith Polyd.) that vseth not to admire these outward honours which may alike be giuen to the vnworthy aswell as to the well-deserning, and may alike be taken away from either? But the praise of this Hadrian is of another farre more noble kinde and eternall: for he was the man who first reuiued the glory of the ancient Latine eloquence, and of all other sorts of abstruse and exquisit learnings, as in which himselfe excelled. Thus doth Polydor (himselfe an Italian,) celebrate the learning of his Country-man, of whose other qualities, yet others write more hatshly; as that out of meere ambition to be Pope (without any other grudge) hee conspired, with Alphonso Petrucci, and other sacred Cardinals, to murther Pope Leo the tenth: induced thereto by suggestion of a Witch, who foretold him that one Hadrian, an old man, of meane parentage, of great Learning and wisdome, should succeed in the Papacy. The man thought it must needs be himselfe, as being, though of very base Parentage, yet of some noble qualities: but another * Hadrian, the sonne of a Dutch Brewer, and instructer of Charles the fifth the Emperour, prooued to be the man; and this our Hadrian lost by deputation all his promotions whatsoeuer, for his nefarious attempt. Into such extreame folly is learning and wisdome metamorphosed, where it is tainted with Ambition, or wants a Religious discretion to manage it aright.

Warre with France and the causes.

those which were farre more apt for the seruice of God, and for attaining of knowledge, then in martiall tumults; yet the quality of his supereminent place enuied vnto him that felicitie; for he was necessarily drawne into a warre with France vpon lesse occasions. Anne the young Dutchesse of Britaine, (by their aduise, who affected to preserue the liberty of that Dukedome, which by vnion with France, would be absorpt & extinguished,) had so farre entangled and engaged her selfe with the Procurators of Maximilian King of Romans, that shee was not only publikely cõtracted, but cõtented (for vttermost performãce of those rites whereof marriage by proxie was honorably capable) to take vpon her the Bride, and being solemnly bedded, to permit Maximilians Deputie, in the presence of sundry Noble witnesses aswell men as women, to put in his legge, stript naked to the knee, betweene the spousall sheetes, that ceremony seeming to amount to a Consummation. Charles King of France, notwithstanding these solemnities, and his owne particular engagement with the Lady Margaret daughter of Maximilian, (whom for the purpose of marriage he had already entertained into France,) did so ambitiously and vehemently couet to gaine Britaine, that vpon confidence of his force, hee resolued to breake through all respects, and not only to offend all his forreine friends, but to make them his iust enemies, rather then to faile in effectuation. Instruments are therefore very secretly set on worke, and batterie is placed with bags of gold at all the opportunities which might let in his purpose. Ambassadors also (the *Lord Frances of Lutzenburg, Charles Marinian, and Robert Gagwine *Generall of the Order of the holy Trinitie, are dispatched to Henrie, praying that with his good will he might dispose of the body of the Lady Anne in marriage according to the right which he had thereunto, as the chiefe Lord of whom shee held the Dukedome. Henry denied the request, but yeelded notwithstanding to send Ambassadors into France there to Capitulate about a peace. The French carried this affaire with notable Art, for to diuert the world for looking into the depth of their drift, King Charles still detained the young Lady Margaret, Maximilians daughter; so as at most it could be but suspected, that Charles meant to match her with some of his blood, and all the entercourse of Orators and Ambassadors vsed in the meane time, tended but to hold the English busied vpon other obiects, till they had wrought their feate in the Court of Britaine. For Maximilian, (to let the world see what iniuries shall be offered euen to Kings, that are not strong) him they altogether neglected; King Henry they plaied with, and Ferdinando King of Castile (who was ready to ioine with Maximilian and Henrie *against the French) they resolue to appease, with rendring vp vnto him the Counties of Ruscinoon, and Perpinian; as accordingly they *did, without *reembursement of one penny of those 300000. Crownes, for which Iohn King of Arragon (father to Ferdinando) had morgaged them. The young Ladies doubts, rising either out of religion, or point of honor, his cunning Agents, and Emissaries wipe away with these solutions. That Maximilians daughter was not of yeeres to consent, and therefore the contract betweene King Charles and her, did not binde either in law, or conscience: That her owne contract with Maximilian was void, for that it was done without the consent of her Soueraigne Lord, King Charles, whose ward or Client shee was. The Ladie vanquished in her iudgement with these reasons, attracted with the present greatnes of King Charles, and loath by refusall to make her Countrey the seat of a long and miserable warre, secretly yeelded to accept of another husband. Thomas Goldstone Abbot of S. Augustines in Canterbury, and Thomas Earle of Ormond in Ireland, King Henries Ambassadors into France, hauing beene dandled by the French during these illusiue practises, returned without other fruite of their labors.

(29) What could now the most patient doe lesse then take sword in hand vpon so palpable and vnworthy illusion? But Maximilians wrongs were too impudent and intollerable; for Charles sent home the Lady Margaret, and married the Inheretrix of Britaine, annexing it to his owne Realme: whereas King Henrie found himselfe rather mockt, then otherwise empaired. Iames Contibald hereupon comes Ambassador from Maximilian, and obtained his requeste, which was, that they with ioynt forces should by a certaine day prefixed, inuade the French, in full reuenge of these their bold prouocations; Maximilian for his part, promising to support that warre with at least ten thousand men for two yeeres. King Henry hauing formerly in abundant manner prouided himselfe of treasure, was ready before the day with a roiall army: but Maximilian (whose will to worke the vttermost mischiefe to France was not doubted,) being sent vnto by King Henry, signifying his forwardnes, was found vtterly vnfurnished. Causes of Maximilians weakenesse in state, were the rebellions and dislikes of his Flemish Subiects cherished by the French, the iealousie of Princes neighbourhood making them vniustly glad either of others molestations. For subduing whereof though King Henry had heretofore giuen him good and successefull assistance vnder the conduct of Giles Lord Dawbeney Gouernour of Callis, the Lord Morley and others, whereby he the rather ouercame; yet was hee the feebler, as then, by reason of so fresh exhaustures. King Henry with good cause was not a little troubled at these newes, secretly signified by his trustie Almner M^r. Christopher Vrswick, and Sir Richard Risley knight, his Ambassadors to Maximilian; For hee was very loath to vndergoe so great an Action vpon his particular strengths, though he doubted not to finde a potent party among the Britaines, (whose affections were as yet but loosely setled toward King Charles,) and yet farre more loath to deceiue the expectation of his owne people, who had so largely contributed; Chiefly the City of London, out of which, euen in those daies he receiued for his furniture in that voiage almost * ten thousand pounds from the Commoners, and (as it seemes by our Author) two hundreth pounds besides from euery Alderman, where the same King could not, but with some difficulty, leuie in the third yere of his Reigne a loane of foure thousand pounds, whereof three of the best Companies are noted (as for hauing done and deserued extraordinarily) to haue lent aboue nine hundred. And verily this wise King (knowing how great a strength that rich City was vnto him) humored that people with all sortes of popularities, for himselfe did not onely come among them, and cause himselfe to be entred a brother, in *one of their Companies, but ware the habite at a publike feast, and late as Maister, as is verie credibly reported out of the Records of their Hall. His wisdome therefore saw, that in giuing ouer the inuasion of France; he should sloathfully abandon a goodly occasion of making himselfe vniuersally acceptable to his people. His resolutions therefore are by him at least wise pretended to continue, and for that cause he sufficiently encreaseth his numbers, that he might seeme able to goe through with that enterprize alone; and though the time of yeere were too farre spent (for he landed not at Calais, till the sixth day of October) yet marcheth he with his whole forces toward Boloigne, being wel assured that with this trowell he should at once plaister two wals, that is, humor his English subiects, and for a peace draw to himselfe store of Crownes from the French.

The chief names who ued in this age.

(30) He had with him besides the flower of his Nobility, and Captaines, answerable numbers of People fit for the seruice. The most named persons were these, Iasper Duke of Bedford Lieutenant Generall of the Army, Thomas Marquesse Dorset, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford, Suffolk, Shrewsburie, Derby, Kent, Deuonshire, and Ormond, sundry Barons, as Dawbeney ney, Abergenny, Delaware, South, Hastings, Cobham, &c. But it is needlesse to weary our selues with long relations of a short voyage; for King Henry, before hee set forth out of England, was secretly dealt with by the Lord Cordes Gouernour of Henault, according to instructions on the French Kings behalfe, to accept of conditions, which till Boloigne was besieged (as now by him it was) was not knowne. The ignorance of this mystery made many forward Gentlemen to morgage their lands, and runne into much debt for their fuller and brauer furniture, in hope to get great matters in this warre, whereof to their griefe they found themselues deceiued. In the mean time the L.Cordes hauing met at Calais with Richard Fox Lord Bishoppe of Exceester, and* Giles Lord Dawbeney, the Kings Commissioners; after iust and long debatement, concluded vpon Articles of peace betweene the two Kings.

(31) Boloigne was brought to some distresse, when by interuention of this agreement it remained safe and quiet King Charles was chiefly moued to buy his peace at a deare rate, both for that the state of Britaine was as yet vnsetled, and for that hee meant forthwith to march into Italy for the * conquest of the Kingdome of Naples; and K. Henry on the other side was not vnwilling, because Maximilian had failed, and Britaine seemed clearely past possibility of euiction. To which may be added, a naturall, noble, and religious inclination in King Henry, to liue in amity with his neighbours; *the inckling of new * dangers*, then in brewing against him by the turbulent, and vnappeaseable Dutchesse of Burgundy, and * cherished by King Charles; and lastly, the enrichment of himselfe by reembursing the charges both of this, and the British warre out of the French elsewhere, whereby he should farre the better bee able to withstand all forrain practises, or domesticke outrages. As for the preseruing of himselfe, and his honour with his Subiects, hee wanted not both true and honourable glosses: Such as were the care to auoid vnnecessary effusion of Christian bloud: the vses of his presence at home, besides many other: but his wisdome in the carriage of this right weighty action was chiefly eminent in this, That hee would not enter into Treaty, till he was in the field; and that with such a puissance, as was likely enough to force his owne conditions; nor suffer the least signe of his secret willingnesse to peace, or inward doubt of troubles at home, to creepe out at any crany or chinke of his discourse or carriage, whereby he as farre outwent the French fairely, as they formerly seemed to haue ouerwrought him subtlely. Had they truly beene informed in those points, it is probable they might haue gone a cheaper way to work: for, besides what other Articles soeuer, it was concluded, That Henry should * not quit his clayme to France; but that for a Peace, which by the contract was only to continue during the two Kings liues, Charles of France should pay in present to Henry for his charges in that warre, * seuen hundred, forty and fiue thousand * Duckets, and twenty fiue thousand Crownes yeerely toward the expenses, which hee had heretofore been at in aiding the Britons. Which (by the English called Tribute) was duly paid during all this Kings raigne, and also to Henry his son, till the whole debt was run out, thereby to preserue amity with England. There were moreouer (by Henries consent, who was thus content to gratifie his Peeres at anothers cost) not onely present rewards, but also certaine annuall pensions allotted to the chiefe Lords of his priuie Councell. A course of bounty which might otherwise haue proued preiudicious to the seruice of the King of England, by engaging his Counsellors affections to the French: The siege of Boleine lasted till the eighth day of November, & Henry (whom his Queens most * tender, frequent and louing lines, did the rather inuite to speediest returne,) hauing setled all his transmarine affaires, * arriued at Douer, from whence hee iourned to Westminster, there to celebrate the Feast of Christmas. This voyage into France, affording no greater exploites then wee haue heard, was celebrated by blind * Bernard with hyperbolicall and well-borne verses not ordinary, in which directing his speech in honour of Henry, to the Howres he concludes.

(32) The famous counterfeisance of Perkin Warbecke, with which the braine of the Lady Margaret Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie had long trauelled, doth now beginne to disclose it selfe, and make new businesses for King Henry. The inglorious glorie of the first inuention in his raigne of this kind of vexation, Lambert Simnels person had giuen to his Master the wily Simon, so that our Dutchesse was but an imitatrix, and yet perhaps shee gaue not place in any point to the first example, or Archtype, neuertheless the fortune of the first deuise, being no more successefull then it was, might reasonably haue deterred her from the edition of a second: but whether it were an immortall enuie toward the Lancastrian race, or a burning zeale of aduancing one that might at leastwise beare the name of a Plantagenet, though by any sinister practises; as if it had beene lawfull to attaine her ends (admit them iust) by any iniurious courses, shee resolues to erect another Idoll, as perceiuing by the first, how notable an engine impostur was, to trouble Henry; being well assured, that England was ful of corrupt humors, and ill-affections to worke vpon, not so much through the desert of her present King, as for that the dregges which naturally reside in the bottom of mens hearts, where most bloudy and barbarous factions haue for a long time weltered, and wurried one the other with various euent, were not clensed and auoided. The Diuell therefore ready to furnish all attempts which may raise trouble, and mischiefe, easily fitted her. There was come therfore to her hands a youth adorned with such a shape, as might easily perswade the beholders was worthy of a noble fortune: he had thereunto a naturall fine wit, and (by reason of his abode in England in K. Edwards dayes) could speake our language, as also some other, which hee had by a kind of wandring trauell obtained. This youth was borne (they say) in the City of Tornay, and called Peter Warbecke*, the* son of a conuerted Iew, whose Godfather at Baptisme King Edward himselfe was. The English in * contempt (and for a note perhaps of his forraine birth) did afterward call him by a diminutiue of his name, Peterkin or Perkin. Him the Dutchesse (as a fitte peece of timber, out of which to carue a new Idoll) moulds by degrees, & makes him take shape according to that Idea, which shee had prefigured in her working imagination; before the which the late honours of her house conspicuous in three Princes (which altogether made not twenty and fiue yeeres of raigne) did so perpetually houer, as her soule could neuer take contentment, but in the hope that the house of Yorke should againe be the dwelling place of Maiesty.

(33) Her offence against Henry wanted not many seeming reasons, but none so great, as that hee had slaine her own brother King Richard, who albeit he was there reputed murtherer of her Nephewes, yet were they a degree more remoued from her, and so lesse deere in likelihood then a brother; and howsoeuer shee might secretly detest, or believe the commitmẽt of that parricide, yet could she neuer brooke (seeing they were gone) that the reward of her brothers death, and that euen to him who slew him, should bee the Crowne of England, whereby not onely onely her brother, but the whole male-line of her family was for euer to bee excluded; much leſſe could ſhee (a Plantagenet) abide that Henry, who brought to the Crowne the ſurname of a newly raiſed Familie. Theſe and other conſiderations in the breaſt of a Lady, bred vp in a dominating Family, her ſelfe a Dowager, in ſuch a fortune, as in which ſhee was Paramount for the time, and abſolute without controlment, being careleſſe withall of ſauing for poſterity, becauſe ſhee was without a child, and in that regard the more abundantly ſtored with treaſure; all which made her ſpirits ouer-boile with impatience and virulency; ſo farre forth, that hauing infuſed al her principles into Peter her creature vnder the Title of Richard Plantagenet, ſecond ſon of King Edward the fourth; ſhe moſt couertly ſends him into Portugall, from thence to take his Icarean flight, as * elſewhere is related. Neuertheleſſe, there will not (perhaps) want ſome, who in defence of the Dutcheſſe, had rather referre it to Magnanimity, and Nobleneſſe of Spirit, in ſeeking the honour of her houſe; which, if it might paſſe for ſuch among the heathen, yet can it not among Chriſtians; much the leſſe, for that her duty to England, & the royall flouriſhing eſtate of her own Neece, the right heire, exacted at her hands a greater tenderneſſe.

(34) That Peter Warbecke ſhould bee inflamed by her fauours, and encouragements, to dare in earneſt the perſonation of a Kings ſonne, ſeemes not a thing to bee admired; for there is in humane nature (which ties not her ſelf to Pedigrees, nor Parentages) a kind of light matter, which will eaſily kindle, being toucht with the blazing hopes of ambitious propoſitions. He therefore vpon the firſt diſcloſe of * himſelfe, did put on ſo excellent a ſeeming as might iuſtly moue King Henry to bee iealous, whereunto the pernitious practiſe might come at laſt; for there wanted nothing in the whole forme of the young vpſtart, but onely the conſcience of a truth, and truth it ſelfe: which makes me call to mind * what one hath written of a goodly white Saphyr in Venice, made by art ſo neerely to reſemble a true Diamond, that with much difficulty, and but by one onely lapidary, it was diſcouered; which if it had beene graced with ſome great Princes, wearing, what could want to haue made it paſſable for a very Diamond of greateſt value? Perkin came ſuch from out of the Burgundian forge; and (if his parentage bee reſpected) aſſumed the image and reſemblance of a king, being otherwiſe not ſo much as a meane Gentleman. Neither can it be maruelled at, if ſuch a Phantaſme as this, did abuſe, and trouble the common people of that time; for euen to ſuch as do write thereof, it begets a kind of doubt (which without ſome little collection of their ſpirits doth not eaſily vaniſh,) it ſeeming almoſt incredible, that ſuch a bloudy play ſhould meerly be diſguiſed and fained; the diſcouery therefore was worthy ſuch a wit as King Henries, and the puſh it gaue to his ſoueraignty did throughly try his ſitting, being of force enough to haue caſt an ordinarie rider out of ſadle.

(35) Therfore, it was the Dutcheſſes miſfortune, that her inuentions (if they were hers) had to encounter ſo politicke and conſtant a man as King Henry; whoſe prudence ſearcht into the abſtruſeſt ſecrets, and whoſe diligence ouercame all difficulties. Yet the Lady Margarets courſe to vent her Creature at the firſt was exquiſite; for ſhe (as in a Magicke practiſe) hauing kept him ſecret till ſhee ſaw her time, cauſeth him to bee cloſely conuayed into * Portugall; from whence (attended with fitte aſſociates and Priuadoes) hee ſailes into Ireland (the Foſter-place and nurſery of immortall good will to the houſe of Yorke) where (notwithſtanding their late calamities,) he ſo ſtrongly enchanted that rude people with the charmes of falſe hopes, and miſts of ſeemings, as he was ſure of partakers in great plenty. Charles the eight, King of France, hearing (and perhaps beleeuing) that the Duke of Yorke was aliue, and glad to haue ſo probable an occaſion of doing miſchiefe to Henry of England, in regard of theſe flagrãt enmities which as then remained vnquencht betweene them, inuites Duke Richard moſt officiouſly to Paris, and beſides all other honours, aſſigned him (at his comming) a guard for his perſon, whereof the Lord Congreſhall was Captaine. Afterward there repaired to this new Duke, Sir George Neuill Knight, (a * baſtard of the noble houſe of the Neuils,) Sir Iohn Taylor, Rowland Robinſon, and about an hundreth Engliſh, to whom (as a principal) wee may adde * Stephen Frion, French Secretary to King Henry himſelfe; all which, together with the whole Strategeme, was ſmoakt out of France with the firſt graine of incenſe ſacrificed vpon the Altars of Peace at Boloign, after the ſame was once made and ratified (as you haue heard) between the French and vs. The Dutcheſſe then ſeeing her artificiall creature thus turned againe vpon her hands, pretends an extreame ignorance that euer ſhee had ſeene him before that preſent, and an exceſsiue ioy for his miraculous eſcape, and preſeruation, which ſeemed ſuch to her (as ſhee pretended) as if hee had beene reuiued from death to life, and that the fable might want no quickning, which her perſonall countenancing, or her Court could afford, ſhee openly ſalutes him by the delicate Title of the * White Roſe of England, and queſtions him of the manner of his eſcape, with ſuch like, to beget a firme beliefe in the hearers, that ſhe neuer had ſeene him before that time, and that he was indeed her Nephew Richard Duke of Yorke. The Nobility of Flanders accordingly, doe vnto him all honour, and ſhee enuirons his perſon with a guard of thirty men in murrey and blew. Neither was hee in any point wanting to his part; but fitted ſuch likely anſweres to all queſtions, and ſuch princely behauiours to all occaſions, as made fame bold to publiſh him with the fulleſt blaſt of her Trumpet, for no other then a true Richard Plantagenet; and as it is ſo obſerued of ſome, that by long vſing to report an vntruth, at laſt forgetting themſelues to bee the Authors thereof, beleeue it in earneſt; ſo theſe honors making our Peter to bury in vtter oblivion his birthes obſcurity, he ſeemed to bee perſwaded; that hee was indeed the ſelfe partie, whom hee did ſo exactly perſonate. Nouelty, and impudency were ſcarce euer knowne to haue found more applauſe, or beliefe, euen among many verie wiſe, and (otherwiſe) worthy men; who moued in conſcience, and not onely vpon diſcontent, inclined to partake with this new Plantagenet, as the onely right heire of the Engliſh Diadem, as if, whether he had beene the true one, it was paſt diſpute. This intoxication, & abuſion of the world, was wonderfully encreaſed by the ſecret reuolt of Sir Robert Clifford Knight, whom (as one that had ſeene, and knowne the true Richard) the cunning conſpirators in England had ſent ouer, to informe himſelfe, and them, whether he was indeed as hee ſeemed. Sir Robert (whoſe preſence and errand were to the Dutcheſſe moſt welcome,) being brought to his ſight, did forthwith giue credite, and conſtantly ſignifie, that this was indeed Richard Plantagenet, the true Duke of Yorke, and that he well knew him for ſuch. Money and encouragements, were hereupon ſent out of England, from ſuch as fauoured him; among whom was * Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain to King Henry (by whoſe punctual reuolt from K. Richard, he had principally atchieued the Crowne of England) * Iohn Ratcliffe, L. Fitzwalter, * Sir Simon Montfort, Sir Thomas Thwates Knights, and others; but the maine countenance of the cauſe in forraine parts was Sir Robert Clifford (a knight of an honourable fame and family) which moued the ſecret friends of the new Duke to ſet the rumor ſo cunningly on foot among the Engliſh, *that * ſooner might a cloud, which cauſeth thunder, bee caught or knowne, then the Author thereof*; and multitudes beeing weakened therewith, ſtore of humor humor, dangerously prepared to mutation, did euery where discouer it selfe.

(36) For preuention therfore of all those effects, which might issue out of these causes, (being in their proper nature most generatiue of sedition, and of all sorts of ciuill furies) King Henrie diligently causeth the coasts of England to be well and strongly watcht, aswell to empeach the landing of enemies, as the escape of fugitiues: but aboue all, he writes letters to his best friends in forraine parts, & also emploies nimble wits with seueral instructions; some to assaile the constancy of Sir Robert Clifford, (the maine stay and credite of Perkins cause) with promise of immunity and fauour if hee would returne into England in quiet; others, to find out the truth of Perkins quality, being furnished with treasure to draw and requite intelligences; and all of them (as occasion should serue) to pretend themselues vehement fauorers of the new Duke. These necessary hypocrites and double faced Ambidexters, called Spies, (whose seruices, howsoeuer conducible to such as sets thē on worke, yet their perfidious quality cōmonly partakes with that of Iudas Iscariot, and often meetes with like reward,) doe plie their charge so roundly that * Sir Robert Clifford is secretly drawne off, the new Duke is discouered aswell by them, as by * sundry letters from friends abroad, to bee but Perkin Warbecke, and many other mysteries are reuealed. This gaue to the wise King great satisfaction, who to weaken the enemies practise the more, not onely diuulgeth the fraud, but sends ouer sea Sir William Poinings Knight, and Sir William Warham his Ambassadors to the Arch-Duke Philip, Duke of Burgundy (then gouerned by others by reason of his tender age) who promised not to assist the said Perkin, but if the Dutchesse Dowager would doe any such thing to the preiudice of King Henry, it was not in him to hinder her, for that she might dispose of her owne. A maine argument vsed by these Ambassadors before the Archdukes Counsell to conuince, that Richard the very Duke of Yorke was murdered as well as King Edward his brother German, as Polydor (who seemes to haue had good means to vnderstand these times) rehearseth it, was, That their vncle Richard should in vaine haue made away the elder brother, if the younger had beene suffered to suruiue, for that the right of the elder, was immediately vpon his death in the younger, and that consequently during his life, King Richard could haue no more assurance, then if the elder were still aliue: which Argument notwithstanding doth at most proue nothing but this: That their vncle the Vsurper might intend, that both his Nephewes should bee murdered, and that hee knew nothing perhaps to the contrary. Whereas facts are to bee proued by confessions of parties, by witnesses, or vehement presumptions, (though vehement presumptions are said to constitute but an half proof) al which are * otherwhere so supplied, as leaues smal cause to doubt of both their deathes. But Warham (a learned Priest and Doctor in the lawes) the mouth of that Ambassage sent to the Arch-Duke, in the end of his oration vsed this bitter scoffe, and Sarcasme against the Lady Margaret: *That shee in her old age brought forth two Monsters within the space of a few yeeres, and both of them not in the eight, or ninth moneth after their conception, as naturall mothers, but in the one * hundred and eightieth moneth; and whereas other women brought forth Infants vtterly vnable to helpe themselues, these birthes of hers were tall striplings, and as soone as they were borne, offered battell vnto mighty Kings.* And albeit the Arch-Dukes answere seemed reasonable, yet was not King Henry so satisfied, but that within a while after, for * that the Arch-Duke had secretly furnisht Perkin with leaders, hee tooke occasion to banish all Flemings, and Flemish wares out of his Dominions, and inhibited his Subiects to trade in any Countries within the obedience of Maximilian King of Romans, or of the Archduke Philip his sonne, who by way of talio and requitall did the like against the English.

(37) Let vs come now from the addresses of things, to their doing. The high prudence and industry of Henry hauing thus discouered the foundations of Perkins hopes in England, and the humors which were most vnsound, made it his first worke to raze those groundworks, and purge the veines of his Realme from that corruption by needfull Phlebotomie. The * Lord Fitzwalter, a principall conspirator, being condemned, and sent to Calais, liued there in hope of pardon; but for practising with his Keepers to escape, hee finally payed his head for satisfaction. Sir Simon Montfort, Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dawbeney (Gentlemen of noble houses) as Captaines and Authors of the conspiracy were beheaded, but all the rest aswel Clerkes as Lay-men had their pardons. Not long after these executions and pardons, the King vpon sure intelligence, that Sir Robert Clifford (in whose bosome the secret of all Perkins plot lay) was arriued, entred the Tower of London, and there continued; that so, if Clifford should accuse any of the great, (and whom hee then would accuse, it is probable King Henry knew) they might without suspition, or tumult bee attached; the Court, and publike prison for crimes of highest nature, being then within the cincture of one, and the same wall. Sir Robert Clifford at his comming into the Kings presence, (though hee was secretly before assured of his life) most humbly praying and obtaining pardon, appeached (among many others) Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine. The King would not at first giue credite (or at least wise pretended, not to giue credite) to the accusation of a Peere so great, and so neere vnto him: but vpon farther search, finding the same confirmed with circumstances, and particularly, for that he said to Clifford, * Hee would neuer beare Armes against the young man, if he knew him for certaine to be the sonne of King Edward, hee resolueth to vse seuerity against the delinquent.

(38) But Bernard Andreas directly saith, That (besides bare words and purposes) Sir William had supported Perkins cause with treasure, wherein hee is recorded so to haue abounded, as that in his Castle of * Holt he had in coine and plate to the value of forty thousand Markes, besides lands of inheritance in sundry places about, to the yeerely value of three thousand pounds (a prety stocke in treasure at those times, to vphold the first brunt of a warre, and a large extent of land to furnish the wing of a powerfull battell with able souldiers out of Tenancies) with all which the same Author in plaine wordes saith, That hee promised to defend the said Pretender, and bring him into the Kingdome. And if we haue any insight into King Henries disposition, it seemes to vs, that before he entred into the Tower, he not only knew the Lord Chamberlaine vnsound, but also that for his quiet apprehension hee chiefly repaired thither. Stanley being hereupon attached and referred to farther examination, is said * To haue denied nothing of all that wherewith hee was charged, which he perhaps the more confidently did, in hope that king Henry would pardon him in respect of passed seruices, they (in their effects considered) being the greatest whereof mortality is capable, preseruation of life, and gaining of a Kingdome. But the poore gentleman found himselfe farre deceiued in his politicke Lord and Master, who (to teach mankind thereby, how dangerous it is to make a King) was not vnwilling to cut him off, as perswading himselfe, that those seruices proceeded of ambition, not of affection, or if of affection, the cause now ceasing, the contrary effects might proue as pernicious, as the other had been aduantageous and auaileable. The King was vnwilling to displease his Father in Law, Thomas Earle of Derby (brother german to Sir William Stanley) and did therefore for a while suspend his iudgement; but rigour finally preuailed, and hee was at westminster openly arraigned, conuicted, and afterward ward at the block on Tower-hil beheaded. In whose office Giles Lord Dawbeney a most faithfull and moderate man succeeded. This sharpe iustice exercised vpon so eminent a person, was of great vse in the stay of peoples minds through the Realme of England. But in Ireland they were not so setled, or reduced, but that for the better and fuller purging thereof, Henry Deuey (a Monke of Langton Abbey) was sent Lord Chancellour thither, with orders and directions, and Sir Edward Poinings Knight, with souldiers; whose greatest diligence and cares were not wanting, to punish such as heretofore had aided Perkin, or might hereafter. The Earle of Kildare Lord Deputy, falling into suspition with Poynings, was by him apprehended, and sent prisoner into England; where the King did not onely graciously heare and admit his defences, but also returned him with honour, and continuation of authority. In the meane time (the errour, or weakenesse of the Burgundian Dutchesse and her Perkin, suffering their enemy in this sort, to puruey for his own security, and their depulsion) hee yet for farther assurance of himselfe makes a progresse into Lancashire, there to recreate with his Father in law the Earle, and the Countesse his mother, where among all other his secret purposes, he throughly satisfied the Earle, both for the iustice and necessity of Sir William Stanleyes death.

(39) These certainely, were perillous times to liue in, and vndoubtedly full of infinite iealousies, and hypocrisies, nor vnlike to those lately passed, * wherein there was nothing so plaine, and openly proued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspect, as many well-counterfeited iewels make the true suspected: these generall distrusts being among the strange gradations, by which the incomprehensible prouidence doth vse to chastise insolent Nations and to make regular Princes, meer and absolute. But the Dutchesse and her Perkin knowing al things as they passed in England, resolue notwithstanding to proceede; and therefore taking aduantage of the Kings absence in the North, he with a force of broken and discontented persons, sets saile for England, and approcheth the coasts of Kent about Sandwich and Deale, there to beginne his enterprize for obtaining the Crowne of England, vnder the borrowed name and title of Richard Duke of Yorke, if he found the Commons forward. But they, though doubtfull at first what to doe, yet at the last considering that his Souldiers were for the most part of desperate fortunes, and felonious qualitie, (though hardy otherwise, and approoued men of warre,) remembring withall the mischiefes of part-takings, would not adhere, but training them within danger vpon promise of succour, assaile, and driue them to their shippes, take fiue of the Captaines, Mountford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintin, and Genin, and * one hundreth, sixty and foure others, which were all of them afterward executed. Perkin himselfe who would not trust his person on shore, being worthily troubled at the inauspicious fortune of his followers, presently hoised sailes, and returned to his Lady Patroneesse and Creatrix, into Flanders.

(40) These newes being brought to the King, where he was then in the North, he is * said to haue giuen God thanks, and declared his ioy in these words. I am not ignorant (most mercifull Iesu) how great victories thou hast giuen mee, vpon the Saturday at the praiers of thy most gracious Mother, all which I ascribe not to my deserts, but to the bounty of thy celestiall grace. Thou seest, ô most benigne Iesu, how many snares, how many deceits, how many weapons, that terrible Iuno hath prepared, notwithstanding that after my marriage shee faining herselfe ioyfull, hath faithfully promised to beare toward vs all fauour and good will, but shee, more changeable then the winde peruerting all things aswell diuine as humane, feares not God, but in her fury seekes the vtter ruine of her owne blood. Thou, ô God, who knowest all, deliuer vs also (if we seeme worthy) from these euils, but if our sinnes haue deserued to suffer, doe thou, ô Lord, thy good pleasure. Neuertheless wee owe to thy Grace immortal thanks, which though with our tongue we cannot vtter worthily enough, yet must they bee rendred. We are alwaies of good courage, and so minded for certain, that no prosperity, no aduersity, no chaunce, no distance of places, or times, shall once make vs of thee vnmindefull. The most modest King hauing ended his speech, doth foorthwith (saith our Author) seriously deliberate with his Councell what was to bee done heereafter. It may probably seeme, that he had withdrawne into the North, to inuite Perkin (by occasion of his absence) the rather to take Land, that so hee might draw all his dangers into one place, and decide them in a Battell, if his Subiects should reuolt to Perkin in any numbers, or if they did not, then might he fall into his hands, by landing vnwarily vpon trust of the peoples fauour, and so by a more compendious, and easie way settle his Estate; of which he failed but little, by the said counterpolicy of the Kentishmen. In regard whereof, in the first Act of Councell, praise and thankes were decreed to them, with which Sir Richard Gylford Knight was presently sent away, and order taken for the erection and watching of Beacons vpon the Coasts.

(14) The Dutchesse on the other side, seeing the South of England proue so drie, and barren to her driftes, conueighes againe her Idoll into Ireland, where shee well knew there could not want partakers; and Perkin himselfe daring to entertaine the hope of a Crowne, (for by so long personation of a Kings sonne, and heire, ambition had throughlie kindled his youthfull blood) was now no little cause of bringing things to an issue by his owne forwardnesse. * Maximilian King of Romans, whither as one willing to keepe the English busied (* Henry hauing forbidden his Subiects all traffike with the Flemmings, and all other of his sonne the Archdukes Subiects,) or as crediting the fiction, and therefore led thereunto in honour and conscience; * Charles also King of France, but specially the Dutchesse of Burgundy, (by whom this bubble was first blowne vp, and put abroad) did concurre to the molestation of King Henry; Maximilian, and the French King, more secretly, but the Dutchesse with all her Oares and Sailes plied it in open view. Borne vp by these supporters he the rather easily drew the Irish to assent to his pretext; but his counsell weighing with themselues that the Irish-mens friendship, how firme so euer, was insufficient in respect of their nakednesse and pouerty to worke their wishes, hee according to such aduises as were taken before his departure from his Creatrix, crosseth into Scotland, for feare of punishment, saith * Andreas; if perhaps by the Kings true Subiects within Ireland hee should chaunce to bee apprehended; but the euent shewes, that it was not onely for his more security, but principally to strengthen his enterprize with the Scotish aide, whereof in those daies hee had small reason to bee doubtfull; and his case was such, that no third course was left vnto him, but either to fight and conquer, or liue branded with immortall infamy both of Cowardize and impostur. Henry hearing these things was not slacke to prouide for his iust defence, greatly carefull vpon what coast this wandring clowd would at length dissolue it selfe, in what effects soeuer; and therefore obserued all his waies with as much curiosity as was possible.

(42) Iames the fourth, a yong Prince of great hope was at that time King of Scots, to whom this bold counterfeit (being specially recommended, for the true Richard Duke of Yorke, by the * King of France, and vndoubtedly much more by the Dutchesse of Burgundy,) repaires; and had most courteous entertainement, and audience, the effect whereof Andreas thus coucheth: That the King was finally deceiued by errour, as most of other, though most prudent Princes, had beene before. But the rare impudency of the the Lad, & that connexion which his darings had with so many great Princes, deserue not to bee so slenderlie ouerpassed. Hee therefore being in honourable *manner accompanied, and brought to the presence of King Iames, had words to this effect. That Edward the fourth late King of England, leauing two sons Edward and Richard Duke of Yorke, both very young, Edward the eldest succeeded their Father in the Crowne by the name of King Edward the fifth: that their vncle Richard Duke of Gloceſter to obtaine the Kingdome, purposed to murder both, but the instrument employed by him to execute the execrable Tragedy, hauing cruelly slaine King Edward the eldest of the two, was mooued to saue Richard his brother, whom neuertheleſſe the world supposed to haue beene alike barbarously made away; though falsely (supposed; for that himselfe there present, was that very Richard Duke of Yorke, brother of that vnfortunate Prince, King Edward the fifth, now the most rightfull, and lineall surviuing heire Male to that victorious and most noble Edward of that name the fourth, late King of England. * That hee in his tender age thus escaping by Gods mercy out of the County of London, was secretly conueied ouer the Sea, * whither when hee was brought, the party who had the conueiance of him in charge, suddenly forsooke him, and thereby forced him to wander into *diuerſe Countries, where he remained certain yeeres as vnknown, til at length he came to the true vnderstanding of himselfe. * In which season it hapned one Henry, son to Edmund Tydder Earle of Richmund, to come from France, and enter into the Realme, and by subtill and fowle meanes, to obtaine the Crowne of the same, which to him the said Richard rightfullie appertained. That Henry as his extreame and mortall enemie, so soone as he had knowledge of his being alsue, imagined, and wrought all the subtill waies, and meanes he could, to deuise his finall destruction. That the said mortall enemie hath not only falsely surmised him to be a fained person, giuing him nicknames, so abusing the world, but that also, to deferre, and put him from entrie into England, hee hath offered large summes of money to corrupt the Princes, with whom he had beene retained, and made importune labour to certaine seruants about his (the saide Richards) person, to murder or poison him, and others, to forsake and leaue his righteous quarrell, and to depart from his seruice, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. That euery man of reason may well vnderstand, that the said Henry needed not to haue mooued the foresaid Costs, and importune labour, if he had beene such a fained person. That the truth of his cause so manifest mooued the most Christian King Charles, and the Ladie, Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundie, his most deare Aunt not onely to acknowledge the said truth, but louingly also to assist him. That now because the Kings of Scotland (Predecessors of the said King Iames) had oftentimes supported them, who were reft and spoiled of the said Kingdome of England, (as in freshest memory King Henrie the sixth,) and for that he (the said King Iames) had giuen cleare signes, that he was in no noble quality, vnlike to his royall Aunce stors, he so distressed a Prince was therefore mooued to come, and put himselfe into his hands, desiring his assistance to recouer the Realme of England, promising faithfully, to beare himselfe towardes the said Scottish King, no otherwise then as if he had beene his owne naturall brother, and would (vpon recouery of his inheritance) gratefully doe to him all the pleasure which lay in his vtmost power.*

(43) Perkins speech ended, and his amiable person being fitted with so many countenancing circumstances of state, and seemings, (by the recommendations of great Princes, aide from the Irish, assured hope of aide in England, and his owne wel-appointed company,) made so strong an impression in the young Kings conceit, that, albeit there wanted not some, who with* many arguments aduised the King to repute all but for a meere dreame and illusion, his person was honorably receiued, as it became the person of Richard Duke of Yorke, and his quarrell entertained; which the more to grace in the Worldes eye, he gaue his consent, that the said Duke of Yorke should take to wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, daughter to the Earle of Huntley, being neere cosen to the King himselfe, a young maide of excellent beautie and vertue. By which marriage, as the gentle King abundantly declared that he tooke him for the very Duke of Yorke, so Perkin, * (distrustfull of the Scots, * and desirous to gaine the loue and fauour of the Nobles of the Realme) cunningly serued his owne ends for the present, passing current for a Prince of high blood, and roiall hope. Vpon this ground a warre was presently vndertaken against Henrie, and entred into; the King of Scots in person, and Perkin, followed with great numbers, specially of Borderers, fell vpon sundry parts of Northumberland, which they most grieuously afflicted, burnt and spoiled; publishing neuertheleſſe by Proclamation made in the name of Richard Duke of Yorke much fauour and immunitie to all such as would adhere to his iust quarrell, and a* thousand poundes in money, and one hundreth markes by yeere, of land of inheritance to the meaneſt person, that could either take or distresse his great enemy, who (he said) was flying the land. But King Henry by his diligence, and wisdome had so setled the mindes of his people in those parts, that there is no mention made of any one person which offered his seruice. This vnexpected auersion so blankt and dampt the Scottish enterprize on Perkins behalfe, that the King offended therewith, retired with his armie (laden with booty) into his Realme, and from thenceforth esteemed of his new Cosen the lesse. But King Henry not minding to forgiue so vniust and causeleſſe outrages, cals a Parliament, opens his griefes, and praies aide for an inuasiue warre against Scotland, which was generally assented vnto, there being scarce anie more gratefull propositions to the English in those swording times, then warre with French or Scots: an humour, vpon which this King did practise to enrich himselfe. For the publike monies by these occasions came into his Exchequer, with a small part whereof he flourished out a show of hostile prouisions, and the Remainder thereupon (if peace ensued, which he alwaies knew how to bring about with honour) was cleerely his owne without account. The summe assented to be gathered was* fixescore thousand pounds, and for collection thereof were granted two dismes, and an halfe, and two fifteenes. But the leuie of this money so granted in this Parliament, kindled a dangerous blaze in England; in so much, that the Lord Dawbeney being sent Generall of the Forces against the Scots, and vpon his way thither, was recalled by occasion of inteſtine troubles.

(44) Which troubles had their Originall from the leuie of such payments among the Cornish, as were assessed for the Scottish warres. When therefore the Collectors came among them, the People (being a stout, bigge, and hardy race of men,) tumultuously assembled; whom one Thomas * Flammock a lawyer, and Michaell Ioseph, a blacke-smith or horse-farrier of Bodmin, like firebrands of rebellion inflamed, and were followed as Captaines, not without secret and silent relation (as it may be suspected) to Perkins pretences, and that hope of redresse (if he were King,) which, by his Proclamations he had colourably giuen to the people, at the time of the Scottish Inuasion; where, among manie other things, (tending to humour such as were maleuolent, by making the person and gouernment of King Henrie odious,) this we find.

(45) Our great enemie (saith the Proclamation) to fortifie his false quarrell, hath caused diuers Nobles of this our Realme, whom he held suspect, and stood in dread of, to bee cruelly murdered: as our cosen Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlaine, Sir Simond Montford, Sir Robert Ratliffe, William Dawbeney, Humfrey Stafford, and many other, besides such as haue deerelie bought their liues, some of which Nobles are now in the Sanctuary. Also he hath long kept, and yet keepeth in prison our right intirely wel-beloued Cosen, Edward sonne and heire to our Vncle Duke of Clarence, and other, withholding Popular insinuations by Perkin.

(46) The tide of people being thus vp: Flammock and the blacke Smyth (hauing firme promise of the Lord Audleys personall helpe) lead them forth toward Kent, where they doubted not greatly to encrease their numbers; and had in likelihood so done, but that the singular diligence and wisdome of the King, frustrated their hopes by sundry Princely Arts. Yet they flow on; and to shew what they durst doe, they slew in their way at Tauntford the Prouost of Perin, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidie; and marching forward without offering other violence, Iames Tuichet Lord Audley ioines himselfe at the City of Wels vnto them, according to secret agreement, and becomes their Generall. From Wels they proceed to Salisburie, thence to Winchester, and so toward Kent, where the Countrey was setled and prouided. But the King farther doubting that the Scots would take fresh occasion, by these seditious vproares, to inuade the borders of his Realme, dispatched Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey (*a Peere of excellent vertue) to defend those parts, with the helpe of the Bishopricke of Durham, and the Marches, till these home-commotions were appeased; that then the Lord Dawbeney might with a iust and full Army prosecute the warre against the Scots. But Iames their King, perceiuing the end of the English intestine warres, would be the beginning of his troubles, thought it best by way of anticipation to weaken his enemy before hand as much as hee could, and thereupon fiercely inuaded Northumberland againe, and* besieged Norham Castell belonging to Richard Fox, whom the King for his noble seruices and deserts, had now aduanced from Exceter, and Bath and Wels, vnto the Bishopricke of Durham. But the Scotish King, hopelesse to winne the Castell, though hauing done much hurt both to it and to the country, withdrew his people before the Earle of Surrey could approach with his Army, wherein was the Earle of Westmorland, the Lords Dacres, Strange, Neuill, Latimer, Lumley, Scrope, Clifford, Conyers, Darcy, the Baron of Hilton, and many Knights, as Percie, Bulmer, Gascoigne, Penington, Bigot, Bowes, Elarker, Parr, wharton, Strangwith, Constable, Ratcliffe, Sauile, Gower, Musgraue, Mallerie, Loder, Eueringham, Stapleton, Wortley, Pickering, Heron, Gray, Ridley, Griffith, Fenwicke, Ward, Stryeland, Bellingham, Curwen, Warcop, Tempest, Metcalfe, and others; who missing the enemy, marched after into Scotland, and tooke such reuenge as the shortnesse of their sodaine prouisions would enable.

(47) The Rebels on the other side, (whom king Henry thought not good to encounter in their first heates; but suffered them to tire their fury, and surbate themselues with a long march, the countries as they past being forelaide from ioyning with them) comming neere to Kent, found few, or no partakers there; but the Country strongly defended against them by the Earle thereof, the Lords Aburgenie and Cobham, with other principall men and their followers; which made diuers of the Rebels secretly shrinke and abandon the enterprise. But the Lord Audley, Flammocke, Michael Ioseph, and the rest, kept on their way, and encamped vpon Blackeheath, between Greenewich and Eltham, from the top whereof they might behold the Citie of London, & the whole brauery of that Horizon. Here they resolue to abide the King, or to assaile London. The King on the other side, by the diligence of the Lord Maior, and other the Magistrates, secured the City, which was full of feare and businesse; himselfe enuironed with his Nobles, & the choice of the South, hearing where the Rebell was encamped, resolued by dint of sword to deliuer his people from tiring expectations, and for that purpose marcheth out of London, and encamps in S. Georges field, where he * lay that night. The next day when he vnderstood that the Enemie had drawne forth his People, and set them in Battell-ray, he sends out Henry Bourchier Earle of Essex, Edmond de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, Sir Rice ap Thomas, and others, with certaine Cornets of horse, and Companies of Archers, to beset the hill, and the descents thereof, while Giles Lord Dawbeney with the strength of his Armie, chargeth the Enemy in Front, whom with some slaughter they draue from the Bridge at Deepford strand; and then mounting the hill, he and the Earles charge the maine squadrons on all sides, and without much labour breake and defeate them. The number of the Rebels slaine is vncertainely reported, the ods being betweene* two thousand and * three hundreth. The Kings armie returned fewer by three hundreth. Fifteen hundred rebels were taken Prisoners, & the takers had their Prisoners goods granted them. Iames Lord Audley, Flammocke, and the Smith were taken and executed. To all the rest mercy was seasonably extended. The Lord Audley led from Newgate to Towerhill in a coate of his owne Armories painted on a paper, reuerst and torne, there paid his head, for being a Head to that heady Route: Flammocke and the Smith were quartered. Memorably *strange was the comfort, with which this Blacksmith is said to haue cheered vp himselfe at his being drawne to execution, saying, That yet he hoped thereby, that his name and memorie should bee euerlasting. Who could beleeue, that the desire of a long-lasting name howsoeuer should take the affections of so meane a person? Such therefore was the end of this insurrection; but the times being queasy, the King wisely forbare to take any seuere reuenge vpon more then onely vpon the chiefe Leaders, for he was truly informed that this calamitie had not broken the willes of the Cornishmen, who remained ready for any desperate sudden occasion, and therefore he abstained from needlesse exasperations, insomuch as that the quarters of Flammocke, and the Smith being once appointed to haue beene set vp in Cornwall for terror, were onely fixed about London, the King thinking good to temper his iustice euen in such a circumstance.

(48) His next care was so to order the warre against Scotland, that the Peace whose foundations he had laid a far off, might bee made to his more honor: & because the iniuries sustained by the youthful errour of King Iames, were too publike to bee altogether forgotten; hee sent the Earle of Surrey, the Lord Neuill, and others, to inuade the Scotish borders with an Army, who pursued the reuenge with great vehemency. Meane-while there arriueth in Scotland Peter Hyalus an Ambassador from Ferdinando and Elizabeth, King and Queene of Spaine, as from friends equally well affected to both parties, to mediate a peace between the two Kings of England and Scotland, which perhaps in their owne persons would not easily haue beene brought about, the point of honour might thereunto haue giuen such empeachment. But this was the way to a peace which King Henry foresaw, there being not onely a strict bond of loue betweene him and Ferdinando, but an ouerture, if not a * secret conclusion, to match his eldest sonne Prince Arthur with the young Lady Katherine daughter of Spaine, who for her excellent vertues was well worthy to be the happy wife of any Prince then breathing. Hyalus so handled the point of his emploiment, that an honourable truce followed. This Ambassador was a practicke man of much experience, and knew the better how to deale on the behalfe of King Henry against Perkin Warbecke, (* an imaginary and Stage-play Prince) for that his Soueraigne Queene had also beene exceedingly molested by a Counterfeit. For Henry the fourth, King of Castile, and brother to Elizabeth, being vnable to begette children, Ioan (daughter of Edward king of Portugall) his wife found meanes notwithstanding to beare one, by occasion whereof, after King Henries death, for that it was borne in marriage, a dangerous warre was vndertaken by * Alfonso King of Portugall, on behalfe of Isabel the supposed inheretrix; but Truth, partly by force, and partly by mediation, was in the end victorious; and Elizabeth, or Isabella sister of Henry succeeded to her brother, and brought the inheritance of the Kingdomes of Castile and Leon, with her to Ferdinando King of Arragon. The chiefe point of this truce with Scotland was, That Perkin Warbecke should leaue that Kingdome, seeing king Iames, standing vpon his honour, would not deliuer him vp to King Henry. Perkin hauing now no remedie, did accordingly, taking with him his wife, the Lady Katherine Gordon; and with such few as remained to him, past into Ireland, where hee had not continued long, but the Cornish-men offer to rise at his arriuall, and to aduenture their fortunes, and liues in his quarrell: Which motion Perkin gladly entertained, as perceiuing yet some little hope left to maintaine himselfe, by the troubles, and hazards of others: but the policie and fortune of King Henry were growne so venerable with the Princes his Neighbours, that Ambassadors came from France, and from the Arch-Duke of Burgundy; the one to ratifie amity, the other to request the restitution thereof; both which K. Henrie (who reposed his whole trust next vnder God, vpon the amity of his neighbours) granted, and the English Merchants (who had been somewhat long forbidden by their Soueraigne to trade in the Arch-Dukes dominions) * returning to Antwerpe were receiued into the same with Procession: so that Perkin could scarce cast his eye vpon any place, not onely where to raise aides, but not where to rest his head, vnlesse perhappes in the Court of the Dutchesse of Burgundie; neither in all his fortunes did any thing seeme miserable or vnworthy, but the great infelicity of his wife, whose beauty, birth, and honourable qualities ought not to haue beene so betrayed by her friends temerity. Perkin hereupon landing at Whitsand Bay in Cornwall in September, found meanes afterward at Bodmin to raise some thousands of people, whom with most lanish promises, inuective proclamations, and strong impudency, he held together vnder the Title of Richard the fourth King of England, whose fate was none of the happiest, while the maiesty of her name might so bee played with by impostors. Perkin thus accompanied, marcheth toward the City of Exceter, purposing if hee could winne it by force, to enrich his Souldiers with the spoiles thereof, and to inuite all other loose or lost people to his seruice by the hope of like booties, and by taking into his possession such places of strength as lay in his way to secure his retreat, if (according to the ordinary fortune of warre) any thing should happen to him vnluckily.

(50) But the King (hearing that the varlet was landed, and againe made head against him in Armes vpon trust of the Cornishmens assistance) is said to "haue smiled, vsing these words; * Loe, wee are again "prouoked by this Prince of Rakehelles, but lest my peo- "ple should through ignorance bee drawne into destructi- "on, let vs seeke to take this Perkin by the easiest wayes we "can. Reason hee had to smile, for now he seemed to see the bottome of his perill, and as it were to hold his enemy empounded within the English Ocean, it being a perpetuall and noble wish of his, that he might looke his dangers in the face, and deale with them hand to hand, as the neerest cut ouer to a full conclusion. Hee therefore prouides accordingly, assembling his forces, and his wits (no lesse to bee dreaded then his forces) sending forth his espials into all parts to obserue the tracke, and hopes of this empty cloud, which is now seene before Exceter, a principall strength and ornament of the Western parts of the Kingdome. Parleys, and the allurements of wordes vnder the guilt title of King Edwards sonne, prouing vnauaileable with those resolute and faithfull Citizens; Perkin forthwith betakes himselfe to violence, sets fire on the gates, mounts his scaling ladders against the wals, and with his vtmost fury labours to force a suddaine entrance, for that as hee suspected, succours could not long bee wanting. The Citizens on the other side, and such of the Country, as came in, prepare, and make a very valiant defence against the Rebell, and in stead of quenching the fires kindled by the enemy at the gates, to open a passage (for they had not Canon or any other Ordinance) the Citizens threw on great store of fagots and fuell, and so with flame did shut vp the way, when the gates themselues were now consumed; and in the mean while they cast vp trenches, and man their walles, from whence, with the slaughter of about two hundred Rebels at this assault they valiantly draue them. Such messengers as by cords slipt downe the walles, to signifie their perill, sped toward the King; but the loyall diligence of * Edward Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord William his sonne, with many principall Gentlemen of those parts, as Trencherd, Carew, Fulford, Halewell, Croker, Edgecomb, Semar, followed with great store of Souldiers, saued him the labour of a personall rescue by timely approch.

(51) Perkin hearing thereof, riseth from before Exceter, and marcheth to Taunton (a goodly town not far off) there to take the musters of his Armie, and to prouide for encounter, where he found very many blanks in the list of his numbers, for that they had secretly shrunke away, as misdoubting the sequell, the Earle of Deuonshire being so neere at hand with the power of the Country, and the King vpon his way against them, with the maiesty and terrour of a roiall name and Armie, none of the Nobilitie (which was chiefly hoped) comming to their aide. Perkin neuertheless makes shew of standing, with such as were left vnto him. The Earle of Deuonshire marching towards Taunton, in the way there came vnto him Edward Duke of Buckingham, a * young Lord full of great honour and courage, followed by a goodly troupe of Knights, [illegible] others excellently well appointed, both for the [illegible] perfons, and their their peoples. These wee finde named as principall; Bridges, Bainham, Barkley, Tame, Wise, Poyntz, Vernon, Mortimer, Tremail, Sutton, Paulet, Bricknell, Sapcott, Lutterell, Wadham, Speck, Beauchamp, Cheney, Tokett, Long, Latimer, Tuberuile, Stourton, Newbrough, Martin, Lynde, Rogers, Hungerford, Semar, Darrell, Barrow, Norres, Langford, Corbet, Blunt, Lacon, Cornwal; and many other prime and valiant men of Armes. The King last of all (to permit as little to fortune as was possible) sent Robert Lord Brooke, Giles Lord Dawbeney, and that renowned and trusty Welshman Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the marrow and strength of his Army before, himselfe following in person with such as hee thought good. Neither was his care causeleſſe, for the Cornishmen were come to that height of desperate obstinacy and malice,* as not one of them but resolued to conquer, or to leaue his carcase in the place. But God loued him and them better then to suffer it to come so farre; for Perkin, whether fearing treason in his owne Army, or otherwise toucht with the conscience of his quality, and damnable estate of the quarrell, wherein it was horrible to die, hauing in his troupe but threescore horse, secretly fled from the seduced Commons. Which when the King heard, hee presently sets out fiue hundreth horse to pursue and apprehend him, before hee should get to the sea, and so escape. Perkin and his remaines thus streightned, tooke Sanctuary at Beaulieu, a religious house within New Forrest, (not farre from Hampton) where the Kings Cornets of horse found them already registred; but according to instructions they beset the place, and maintain a strong watch about it day and night. The other Rebels the while without stroke stricken, humbled themselues to their Soueraignes mercy, and found it in vndeserued measure. Other strong troupes of horse are at the same instant dispatched to S. Michaels Mount in Cornwall, where the beautifull Lady Katherine Gorden had beene left by her lewde husband. Her without resistance they brought safely to the King, whose beauty the whole Court praised, and pittied; but the King most graciously comforting her, sent her away well attended to the Queene his wife, and for her birthes sake allowed her * maintenance, which in honourable manner supported her during the Kings life & many yeeres after. Her faireneſſe was such, and her presence so amiable, that shee deserued to be commonly called The white Rose; whose fortunes (being so far vnworthy either of her birth, her singular modestie, or wiuely faith, notwithstanding the so abiect condition of her husband) as they moued iust commiseration toward her, so they doubled the lustre of her praises.

(52) In the meane while the King makes a reioicefull entrance into Exceſter, to testifie his princely loue to the Citizens, whom he highly commended and graced, both for their courage and loyalty; commanding some of the Cornish Rebels to be executed there, which did the better set-off the others contrary condition. There also hee gaue directions, to offer life, and obliuion of all crimes to Perkin, if he would voluntarily quit the Sanctuary, and submit himselfe. Perkin being now without hope, without abode, without estate, most gladly came forth, and did put himselfe into the Kings hands. Reasons leading that wise Prince to extend this fauour, were drawne out of the depth of true iudgement, cleared from vulgar perturbations: first; it was not altogether impossible, but that Perkin might escape him, (though by offering selfe-violence) and so the world should leese the light of satisfaction in so profound and perhaps a matchleſſe imposture; then againe his youth might merite some compaſsion; but the infinite desire which Henry had, from the mouth of the party himselfe, to learne all the secrets of the plot, and who they were that lay vndiscouered, and yet had finger in the mystical practise, moued him to affect the possession of his person aliue; which now hee had. Thus was this so dreaded a blaze of rebellion suddainly and finally quenched; but not without the teares of many in Deuon and Somersetshire, whose estates the Kings officers scruzed and drained, in reuenge of their partaking, and supporting the Cornish Rebels, either in the field, or flight. Henrie hauing Perkin in his power, gaue way to all such scornes and scoffes, which his Courtiers or others were pleased to passe vpon him, the more to make his person contemptible, who well watched followed the King to London, whither as he progressed, multitudes flockt about to behold the Caitife, * who being a stranger, nor any way (whatsoeuer hee boasted to the contrary) descended of Nobles, had dared to trouble so great a Kingdome, and by his crafty conueiances had induced so many Princes and Nations (not without mischiefe and ruine vnto diuers) to beleeue of him, that which hee neuer was. And that he might in no part bee vnknowne, hee is leasurely conueied on horseback from the furthest part of * London, through Cheapside and Cornhill to the Tower, & backe from thence through Canwicke-streete to Westminster, as the subiect of wonderment, and of all reproach and infamies. The King hauing in this sort taken reuenge of his so strange an enemy, and by curious and often examination comming to the full knowledge of that his soule desired, did set such to attend, as neuer went an inch from Perkins sight, (though hee seemed to goe at liberty) left through the slipperie Arts of his tempting speech and behauiour, hee might vanish into forrain parts, and raise fresh storms in England, & bring new comfort to the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Burgundie, the sinnefull countenance of all this cursed Stratageme, whose heart was now almost riuen in sunder with the newes of her Perkins most hideous shame and misery; the whole blushing tenour whereof might easily come to her handes at once; for Henry caused so much of the principall matter, as Perkin had confessed, to bee *committed to the Printing Presse; (an Art then first appearing among vs,) and published. None can iustly wonder, that wee haue dwelt so long in this wonderfull Storie, but rather perhaps wish that more particularities (though with more prolixity) had bin vsed. And though some other Actions as * Sebastian Cabots discouery, and ouertures of marriages with Spaine and Scotland, came betweene this apprehension, & the execution of Perkin, yet haue we thought it best, (the sooner & at once to rid our handes of a knaue*, as K. Henry iustly called him) to couch al that which concernes him, here together, not fearing to incurre among the learned, the taxation of committing therein contradiction, and confusion of times.

(52) Perkin being thus guarded, doth notwithstanding attempt to escape. And, if it were lawfull to insert particular coniectures, drawn out of the considerations of circumstances, we should perhaps not spare to say, that his attempt for escape, was not without the Kings priuity; vsing such instrumentes to perswade, or furnish his flight, as might withall betray him, that so by degrees (occasion taken to cutte him off) the Realme might be ridde from such perpetuall matter of trouble. For the depraued witte and will of man might find or faine reasons to abuse the world still, if Perkin were at liberty; as that the confessions were extorted by feare, or forged by Henry to serue his turne, and the like. Therfore Perkins intention and escape (for hee was escaped) being discouered to the King, all the wayes were beset, and hee so close pursued, that in the end betaking himselfe to a religious house of Carthusian Monkes, hee declared who hee was, and besought their Prior in the humblest manner he could, for Gods sake to begge his life, which at the Priors suite was granted; but the Kings wrath being kindled, or the passage of his suppressed wrath opened thereby, he banisht all former respects, commanding him to be fettered, and set (for an whole day) in a paire of Stockes, mounted on a Scaffold before before the Gate of Westminster Hall, and the next day to be alike exposed in* Golden Cheape, to the basest of all contempt and scorne, so fettered, stockt, & Scaffolded as before, to the great wonderment (saith Stow) of many, as either insinuating that all were not perswaded of the imposture, or that it seemed strange that one lately of so great Prowesse, should vndergoe so despicable a punishment. But for a seale and total summe of all ignominy and shame (such as no face did euer beare greater) he read his owne confession, written with his owne hand * as followeth.

(54) It is first to be knowne, that I was borne in the Towne of Turney in Flanders, and my fathers name is Iohn Osbecke, which said Iohn Osbecke was controller of the said Towne of Turney, and my mothers name is Katherine de Faro. And one of my Grandsires vpon my fathers side was named Diricke Osbecke which died. After whose death my grandmother was married vnto Peter Flamin, that was receiuer of the forenamed Towne of Turney, & Dean of the Botemen, that row vpon the water, or riuer called Le Scheld. And my Grandsire vpon my mothers side was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of Saint Iohns within the same Towne of Turney. Also I had an vncle called M. Iohn Stalin, dwelling in the Parish of S. Pias, within the same Towne, which had married my fathers sister, whose name was Ione or Iane, with whom I dwelt a certaine season.

(55) And after I was led by my mother to Antwerpe for to learne Flemish, in a house of a cosin of mine, an officer of the said towne, called Iohn Stienbecke, with whom I was the space of halfe a yeere; and after that I returned againe to Turney, by reason of warres that were in Flanders: and within a yeere following, I was sent with a Merchant of the saide Towne of Turney named Berlo, to the Mart of Antwerpe, where I fell sicke, which sickenesse continued vpon mee fiue moneths. And the said Berlo set mee to boord in a Skinners house, that dwelled beside the house of the English Nation. And by him I was from thence carried to Barow Mart, and I lodged at the signe of the old man, where I abode for the space of two moneths.

(56) After this, the said Berlo set mee with a Merchant of Middleborow to seruice, for to learne the language, whose name was Iohn Strew, with whom I dwelt from Christmas to Easter, and then I went into Portingall in company of Sir Edward Bramptons wife, in a shippe was called the Queenes shippe. And when I was come thither, then was I put in seruice to a Knight that dwelled in Lusshborne, which was called Peter Vacz de Cogna, with whom I dwelled an whole yeere, which said Knight had but one eye. And because I desired to see other countries, I tooke licence of him, and then I put my selfe in seruice with a Britaine, called Pregent Meno, which brought mee with him into Ireland. Now when we were there arriued in the towne of Corke, they of the Towne (because I was arrayed with some clothes of silke of my said Masters) came vnto me, and threatned vpon me, that I should bee the Duke of Clarences sonne, that was before time at Dublin.

(57) But forsomuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto mee the holy Euangelists, and the Crosse, by the Maior of the town, which was called Iohn Lewelin, and there in the presence of him and others, I tooke mine oath (as the truth was) that I was not the foresaide Dukes sonne, nor none of his bloud. And after this came vnto me an Englishman, whose name was Stephen Poitron; and one Iohn Water, and laid to me in swearing great oathes, that they knew well that I was King Richards bastard sonne; to whom I answered with like oathes, that I was not. Then they aduised me not to be afeard, but that I should take it vpon me boldly; and if I would so doe, they would aide and assist me with all their power against the King of England; and not onely they, but they were well assured, that the Earle of Desmond and Kildare should doe the same.

(58) For they forced not what part they tooke, so that they might bee reuenged on the King of England: and so against my will made mee to learne English, and taught mee what I should doe and say: And after this they called me Duke of Yorke, second sonne to King Edward the fourth, because King Richards bastard sonne was in the hands of the King of England. And vpon this the said Water, Stephen Poitron, Iohn Tiler, Hughbert Burgh, with many others, as the foresaid Earles, entred into this false quarrell, and within short time others. The French King sent an Ambassador into Ireland, whose name was Lott Lucas, and M. Stephen Frisham, to aduertise me to come into France: and thence I went into France, and from thence into Flanders, and from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England.

They call him Duke of Yorke.

(59) From having thus beene made a publike spectacle, till all eyes were wearied with the view; and imaginations tired with thinking; hee is conuaied to the Tower of London: where it had beene happy, if hee had onely wrought his owne destruction; but the bloudy fate (so to speake of his disasterous birth) would not suffer him to perish single. In the same Tower was prisoner Edward the young Earle of Warwicke, having so beene from the first yeare of Henry to this present, for no fault of his, but for that, as a neere Titler to the Crowne, he carried in his liuing person inseparable matter of danger & sedition. Of his simplicity, by reason of his education in prison from his infancy, there is a report, that as one who liued out of the view of the world, hee knew not an * henne from a goose, or one fowle or Creature from an other. To hasten the ruine of so innocent a daunger, behold there breakes foorth a counterfeit Earle of warwicke, as if all that which the world saw horrible in Perkins darings, had been but a document to instruct others in the like, and that nothing were to be taxed therein, but want onely of successe, which whosoeuer could propound to himselfe all things else, were full of encouragement and reason. This counterfeit was a * Cordwainers son of London, aged about twenty yeeres, and called * Ralfe Wilford, who for falsly assuming the name & title of the said Earle, being thereunto taught and suborned (a practise which well declared that the malitious Dutchesse of Burgundie did still liue) was hanged at S Thomas Waterings by Southwarke vpon Shrouetuesday.

(60) This new deuise to vncrowne King Henry, so wakened his owne feares, and the eies of the Castilians, (who had secretly agreed to marry their Princesse Katherine to our Prince Arthur) that there seemed no sure ground of succession, if that the Earle of Warwicke were not made away. A fearefull case, where the false reason of State shall faine to it selfe an impossibility of well doing, without shedding innocent blood, and shall therefore resolue to found vpon so crying a sinne, the hope of perpetuity in succession; sith nothing is truer, then that sinne was euer an vnsure basis to settle lasting workes vpon. But ô the narrow capacities of the most seeing men; the confidence whereof did vndoubtedly lead this King (herein not iustifiable, howsoeuer excusable in respect of humane frailty, which might propound to it selfe many feares, and respects both publike and priuate) to connine at the plotted death, or rather formall murder of this harmeleslesse Gentleman, whose wrong may yet moue the hardest to compassion, as it afterwarde stirred God in iustice to reuenge, prospering no part of that great worke which was thereupon thus corruptly sought to be perpetuated. That noble Lady Katherine her selfe was hereof so sensible, that when the diuorce was afterward prosecuted against her by King Henry the eight, her second husband, shee is reported to haue said, That it was the hand of God, for for that to cleere the way to her marriage that innocent Earle of Warwicke was put to vnworthy death. Neither let licentious Practiſes vouch the ſingular Act of Salomon in taking away the life of his elder brother Adonias to colour this homicide: for he that will argue from particular facts in Scripture, ſhall not onely leaue no Adonias liuing, but perhaps no Salomon. To worke this young Warwickes ruine, the miſcheiuous and diſmall wretch Perkin becomes an occaſion, if not an inſtrument, for he by his ſupple inſinuations and flowing promiſes had corrupted his keepers, the ſeruants of Sir Iohn Digbie Knight Lieutenant of the Tower; who (as * was affirmed) meant to haue murdered their maſter, and then to haue ſet Perkin, and the Earle at large, to which practiſe of eſcape the poore Earle is ſaid to haue conſented. Perkin for this conſpiracie had his triall at Weſtminſter, and hee together with one Iohn à Waters, who had beene ſometime Maior of Corke in Ireland, were condemned, and being drawne to Tiborne, had the ſentence of death executed vpon them. Perkin at the Gallowes did reade his former confeſſion, taking on his death that the ſame was true, and vnder-went his puniſhment with patience. Walter Blewet, and Thomas Aſtwood (being two of the conſpirators, for the other two, Strangewaies and Long Roger, being the Lieutenants men alſo, were not executed, nor for ſo much as wee haue read, arraigned) not long after receiued the reward of their offence at the ſame place.

(61) Iuſtice thus tooke hold at laſt of Perkin Warbecke, on whom, the Prouerbe which ſaith, that Pride is the Vſher of ſhame, was worthily verified. Neither could the world accuſe King Henrie for his death, vnleſſe it were, for that he had not hanged him ſooner, but ſuffered him to liue till hee had drawne after him a greater ruine in Warwicks perſon, then in all the former tragedies. For this Earle being a chiefe Prince of the blood, and next heire Male of his houſe to the Crowne of England, (a crime of which his birth onely made him guilty and not any fact of his) being thus charged to haue giuen aſſent to Perkins plot of eſcape, he was publikely arraigned before the Earle of Oxford (then High Steward of England) by the name of Edward Plantaginet Earle of Warwicke, and indited for minding to haue eſcaped (as they ſaid) out of the Tower, and conſequently according to the dreadfull licence of inferences among our Engliſh pleaders in caſes of death) to depriue King Henry of his royall Crowne and dignity, and to vſurpe the Title and ſoueraigne office, proſecuting their bloody Poetry with the like ſanguinary ſyllogiſmes, though vtterly without meaſure, or faſhion. The Earle doubly betraied, firſt by the ſetters of the ſnare, and then by their ſilly or deceitfull perſwaſions who were put about him, confeſſeth the enditement, and ſubmitteth himſelfe to the Kings mercie; that is; offered vp his head to be a ſlipperie foundation of King Henries farther purpoſes; for ſentence of death was thereupon pronounced as againſt a Traitour. This one practiſe ſeemes ſufficient, if not to caſt vpon Henry the Title of a ſhrewd and perillous man, yet to raiſe a doubt, whether (* as one writes) hee was more ſincere and entire then Ferdinando King of Spaine, vpon whom (ſaith that Authour) he did handſomely beſtow the enuie of the death of Edward Plantagenet Earle of Warwicke. The life therefore of this Prince (according to rigour of lawe) being thus in his power, the King gently pardoned all the paines, but the loſſe of his head, which was cut off vpon a ſcaffold at Tower-hill, and then (another gratious fauour) his body was not buried in the Chappel of the Tower, or in any other common place, but at * Biſham by his Anceſtors. Iealous (ſaith * one) the King was ouer the greatnes of his Nobilitie, as remembring how himſelfe was ſet vp; and much more did this humour encreaſe in him after he had conflicted with ſuch Idols and Counterfeits as Lambert Simenel and Perkin Warbeck. The ſtrangenes of which dangers made him thinke nothing ſafe. This Earle was the laſt heire male of the blood, and ſurname of Plantagenet; whoſe race as it was a long time glorious for giuing Kings to England, (euen from King Henry the ſecond) ſo in the end (chiefly for the houſe of Yorke) it became hatefull (as it ſeemes) to God and man, for the moſt horrible and inextinguible deadly fewdes, murder, periuries, and other horrors committed within it ſelfe, which (as then not fully expiated) lay heauily vpon the head of this Earle, and finally threw open all thoſe fences, which the poſſeſſion of Maieſtie and numeroſitie of iſſue had for ſundry ages caſt about it, letting in thereby the ſurname of Tydder being but two deſcents Engliſh, and which now after three deſcents and fiue Princes is alſo vaniſhed. Now, among thoſe few great workes of peace which enſued their firebrands of warre, we muſt remember the marriage of Prince Arthur, with the Princeſſe of Spaine Lady Katherine. The interim from Warwicks death till then, brought forth a verie great p'ague, whereof in London there are ſaid to haue died about thirtie thouſand. The King and Queene remoue to Callais in May and returned in Iune. The maine *buſines was to reuiew and ratifie the ſtate of amity, and negociations, betweene the Engliſh and the Duke of Burgundies ſubiects. Shine alſo was burnt, and being new builded, called Richmund, for which and the like, it will be fitteſt to haue recourſe to vulgar Annals.

(62) The Coaſt of State now ſeeming cleare from al thickning weather, Ferdinando and Iſabella King & Queen of Spain, according to the points of agreemēt betweene them and King Henry, concerning their fourth daughter the Lady Katherine (borne at Alcala de Finari or Complutum) ſent her royally appointed in a goodly Flete to England, there to fulfill in perſon, what hitherto had beene onely treated of, who after many difficulties tooke land at * Plimouth in October. Ferdinando her father was the ſonne of Iohn King of Arragon and Sicilia, and although he was vnlearned, as being brought vp among armes and ſouldiers, yet by vſing the familiarity of wiſemen he alſo became very wiſe, and proued that great Prince which firſt in theſe latter times recalled the old glorie of Spaine, and reared it to ſuch an enuious magnitude, as that the iealouſie thereof hath bred no ſmall quarrels in Chriſtendome. For by his marriage with Iſabella, (ſole ſiſter and heire to Henry the fourth King of Caſtile and Leon,) he raigned in right of his wife, and iointly with her, ouer thoſe two Kingdomes and their appurtenances, who together (ſaith * Marineus of Sicilia) did admirable things and workes moſt holy. They * recouered the huge City and Kingdome of Granada, and part of Andaluzia from the Moores, after they had beene in violent poſſeſſion thereof ſeuen hundreth and foureſcore yeeres, and hauing purged thoſe places from the filth of Mahomets ſuperſtitions, built Churches to the honour of Ieſus Chriſt, by occaſion whereof Ferdinando was ſurnamed the Catholike King. The walles of the Citie of Granada at the time of the ſurrender, which (after about tenne yeeres warres) was by Voabdelis King thereof made to Ferdinando and Iſabella, had * twelue miles in compaſſe, and in the ſame twelue Gates, and a thouſand towres encloſing ſeuen Hilles couered with building, innumerable people, and ineſtimable riches, & the Spaniſh forces at this conqueſt were about 12000. Horſe, & one hundred thouſand foot. The ſaid King and Queene, beſides many other their mighty actions, did alſo firſt diſcouer America, by Chriſtopher Columbus, & thereby brought a whole new world to the notice of Chriſtendom. Iſabella her ſelf, deſcended of the blood roial of England, being daughter of Iohn the ſecond King of Caſtile & Leon, ſon of Henrie the third King of Caſtile and Leon, and of Katherine his wife (daughter of * Iohn Duke of Lancaſter, third ſonne of our Edward the third of triumphall and neuer-dying memorie) was a Ladie,

(63) The Lady Katherine being about eighteene yeeres old, and borne of so great, so noble, so victorious and vertuous parents, is with iust maiesty and solemnity openly * married in Paules Church to Arthur Prince of Wales, aged about fifteene yeeres; and eldest sonne to Henry the seuenth, King of England, and of Elizabeth his wife. The Archbishop of Canterbury assisted with nineteene Bishops and Abbots, mitred, ioyned their hands, and performed all the other Church rites vpon that great day. The vulgar Annals can tell you the splendor and glorie thereof, in apparrell, iewels, Pageants, banquets, guests, and other princely complements, the onely weighty businesse of many weaker braines. A graue Lady (as som haue written) was laid in bed between the Bride and Bridegrome, to hinder actuall consummation, in regard of the Princes greene estate of body; but others alleadge many arguments to proue that matrimoniall performance was betweene thē, howsoeuer her self, (when that afterward came in question) * appealed to the conscience of K. Henry the eight (her second husband) if hee found her not a maide. But Prince Arthur enioyed his marriage a very short while, for in Aprill following hee died at Ludlow, being vnder sixteene yeeres of age: being a Prince, in whose youth the lights of all noble vertues did cleerely beginne to shine. His aptnesse to learn was almost incredible, for (by the report of his * Master) hee had either learned without booke, or otherwise studiously turned and reuolued with his own hands & eies these authors following. In Grammar, Garin, Perot, Sulpicius, Gellius and Valla: In Poetrie, Homer, Virgil, Lucan, Ouid, Silius, Plautus, and Terence: In Oratorie: Tullies Offices, Epistles, Paradoxes and Quintilian. In Historie, Thucydides, Liuie, Caesars Commentaries, Suetonius, Tacitus, Plinius, Valerius Maximus, Salust, Eusebius. Wherein wee haue beene particular, to signifie what Authors were then thought fitte to bee elementary and rudimentall vnto Princes; and by their example, to all of Noble or gentle birth, whose superficiall boldnesse in books in these frothy dayes, is become most scandalous and iniurious to the honour, and vse of learning.

(64) But before the vntimely expiration of this great hope of England, King Henry weary of warres and tumults, and desirous to lay the beginnings of a long peace by most inward friendship with all his great neighbours, had concluded a match betweene Margaret his eldest daughter, and Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the * assurance whereof was published in the February next before Prince Arthurs death at Paules Crosse; in reioycement whereof, Te Deum was sung, and other signes of publike ioy declared. The * Bishoppe of Rosse saith, that the Earle of Bothwell did openly handfast, or espouse the said faire Lady, in the name of King Iames at Pauls Crosse, being Saint Paules day. This contract was brought about in manner following. After that the storme of warre had (by mediation as before said) beene throughly laid betweene the two sister Nations, it chanced certaine of the Scots by their suspitious behauiour, and rough Phrases to prouoke the Garrison of Norham Castle to issue, who in the bickering slew and hurt some of them, and droue the rest away. King * Iames expostulates this violence very sharply by letters with King Henry, who returned most satisfactory answeres. Richard Fox Bishop of Durham (whose the men and Castell were) wrote also many deprecatory letters, humbly praying the Scotish King to accept amends, wherunto hee in the end inclined, and hauing some matters of farre greater moment to impart, desired the Bishops presence in Scotland (knowing his deepe wisdome and great grace with his Soueraigne) which King Henry gladly assented vnto. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of Cistertian Monkes, where the King abode, who hauing roundly vttered to the Bishoppe his offence conceiued for the breach of good termes at Norham Castell, and yet being finally pleased to receiue satisfaction, hee then secretly discouered his whole mind, the summe whereof was, That the king of England would be pleased to giue to him in mariage the Lady Margaret his eldest daughter, as a pledge of indissoluble amitie. The Bishoppe promised his best diligence, and accordingly after his returne, laboured therein with King Henry, who most gladly hearkened thereunto. Whereupon the Scotish King sent the Archbishoppe of Glasco, the Earle of Bothwell, and others to demand the Lady in marriage. Their entertainement was hearty and princely. But when the proposition came to scanning at the Councell table, it had not currant passage at first: for there were who obiected as an inconuenience; That by this marriage the Crowne of England might come to the Scotish line, by the issue of Lady Margaret. Whereunto it is said, King Henry made this answere * What if it should? for if any such thing should happen, (which Omen God forbid) I see it will come to passe, that our Kingdome shall leese nothing thereby, because there will not bee an accession of England to Scotland, but contrarily of Scotland vnto England, as to that which is farre away the most noble head of the whole Iland, seeing that which is lesse veseth to accrue to the ornament and honour of that which is much the greater, as Normandy heretofore came to be vnder the dominion and power of the English our forefathers. When this was said, the whole boord of councell receiued it as an Oracle, & it went cleare about, That Margaret should be married to the King of Scotland. With this answere and other instructions the Scotish Ambassadors were sent home, who afterward returned into England with full authority & satisfaction to all Henries propositions, whereupon ensued the before said publishment of assurances at Paules Crosse. It was a principall Article in this agreement: That no Englishman should enter Scotland, nor Scot into England without commendatory letters from their Soueraigne. Which Article was reputed a speciall meane to preserue the peace inuiolable.

(65) But ere the young Lady her selfe was conuaied into Scotland, her brother Prince Arthur died, and in * February next ensuing, their mother also Queene Elizabeth, as shee lay in Child-bed within the Tower of London. The King to repaire his mind with fresh consolations, in aduancing his onely remaining sonne, Henry Duke of Yorke, created him suddainely Prince of Wales, Earle of Chester & Flint, within few dayes after his mothers decease. Thus was Arthurs losse supplied, howsoeuer. Henry made Prince, espoused soone after (* though with much reluctation) the Lady Katherine his elder brothers widdow, * vpon the fiue and twentieth of Iune, at the Bishoppe of Salisburies house in Fleetstreet. And in this wise, by prouiding so worthy a wife for him, (though to say truth, her great Dower was the chiefe motiue) the king thought, that the estate of England was sufficiently setled; wherfore conuerting his cares to the accomplishment of affinity with Scotland, hee most sumptuously furnished his deerest eldest daughter for her iourney, & himself in person trauelled frō Richmund as farre with her as Coleweston beside Northampton, where his mother the Countesse lay: * after certaine dayes spent in solace, the King gaue her his blessing, with fatherly counsell and exhortation, and committed the guard and conduct of her person principally to the Earles of Surrey and Northumberland, and to such Ladies and Gentlewomen as were appointed to that seruice; a great company of Lords Knights, Esquiers, & men of Marke attending them as farre as Berwicke. And verily, during the life of King Henry the ſeuenth, no cauſe of breach was miniſtred by either of the Princes, but they continued in great loue and friendſhippe, and mutuall ſocietie, contracting of marriages, continuall enterchange of Merchandize betwixt the Subiects of both the Realmes, as they had beene* AL vnder the obedience of ONE PRINCE; where through, Iuſtice, Policy and Riches did flouriſh and abound throughout the whole Iſle of Albion. And of this marriage is Iames the ſixth deſcended, being that ONE PRINCE vnder whoſe obedience AL are now gouerned, as vnder the ſole and lawfull lineall Monarch of great Britaine: for this Iames the fourth had Iſſue Iames the fifth, hee had Iſſue Queene Mary, ſhee had iſſue our preſent Soueraigne, the great grandchild of the ſaid Queene Margaret eldeſt daughter of K. Henrie the ſeuenth.

(66) Which effects of peace and riches, as they could not but bee comfortable to ſo wiſe a King as Henry, they being the fruit as it were of his owne iuſt labours; ſo let vs now obſerue the laſt worldly cares of his raigne, and vpon what obiects hee fixed his mind, freede from the awe of open challenges of the Crowne, and from throwes at his maine, which with what art, valour and felicity, hee at firſt atchieued, and with how great hazards, troubles, and bloudie buſineſſes, he brought it to ſuch paſſe, that neighbour Kinges reputed it ſafe to entermarry with his family, wee haue already heard: Two principall points tooke vp the laſt Scenes of his life; for the reſt of his time hee wholy employed, either in the ſeruice of Almighty God (wherin hee was ſo diligent, that euery day he was preſent, after the deuotions of thoſe times, at two or three Maſſes, oftentimes hearing godly Sermons,) or in building, wherewith hee kept his ſenſes buſied. The one of the two chiefe points, was to watch ouer the waies of his wiues kindred (the remaining branches of the tnrbulent and vnfortunate houſe of Yorke) whoſe growth and greatneſſe hee ſuppoſed might at ſome time or other ouertoppe his owne; the other was, vnder opinion of iuſtice, to encreaſe his treaſure out of the common purſes, wherby he ſeemed onerous to many, & ſom what obſcured the brightnes of his former glory, at leaſtwiſe diminiſhed his opinion with the generality. Concerning his courſes holden with his wiues kindred, (the laterall iſſues and ſtaddles of the Plantagenets) it fell out thus; which (by * occaſion of the accidentall landing of Philip King of Spain at this time, wherby the *Earle of Suffolkes taking was procured) we thought it beſt to handle here together. *Edmund de la Pole Earle of Suffolke (ſonne to Iohn Duke of Suffolke, and of Elizabeth ſiſter to King Edward the fourth) in the ſixteenth yeere of King Henries raigne, wilfully ſlew a common perſon in his furie. Henry not ſorry to haue occaſion of encreaſing his popularity, by preſenting ſo great a perſon to exemplary iuſtice, and in the ſame act to blemiſh the honour of a man, whoſe quality was to him ſuſpected, cauſed him for the ſame to be arraigned. The fact hee was perſwaded to confeſſe, and therupon had pardon. The Earle neuertheleſſe, as a Prince of the bloud, holding himſelfe diſgraced, by hauing been ſeen a Priſoner at the Kings Bench Barre, fled the land diſcontented, and went to his Aunt the Dutcheſſe Dowager of Burgundie; but within a while after, being fairely reconciled, hee returned. After which, notwithſtanding, whether it were by reaſon of debt (the certaine attendant of vaine-ſpirited, and baſe-braue-minded Courtiers) wherinto he had deeply thrown himſelf for his furniture, at the celebration of his coſen Prince Arthurs marriage, or for that the reſtleſſe ſpirit of enuie in the Dutcheſſe had preuailed, hee taking his brother with him, fledde againe the next yeere after. The King who had pardoned his life, ſeemed now to repent his clemency, * though it is plaine, hee ſpared him of purpoſe, till hee might diſcouer more of a conſpiracy which hee knew was in hammering; but his flight troubled him not a little, knowing the violent humor of that Lord, and remẽbring to what a dangerous & bloudy iſſue his brother the Earle of Lincolne had once already brought things at the battell of Stoke in the beginning of his raigne.

An office vnworthy of Knighthood; neither can any good ſpirit in the world ſtoope it ſelfe to ſuch double faced emploiment, which beſides the treacherous diſſimulations thereof, cannot but bee accompanied with wilfull impieties. For who is admitted into truſt vpon a contrary ſide, without inuocations of Gods holy name, proteſtations, adiurations, oathes, the vtmoſt aſſurances which man can giue to man, to beget a conuenient affiance in his ſincerity? but by this ſtratagem the king ranſackes the boſomes and cabinets of his aduerſaries, diſcouering their deſignes and hopes. Whereupon, William Courtney Earle of Deuonſhire (being moſt nobly deſcended, and hauing to his wife the Lady Katherine, one of the daughters of K. Edward the fourth, and ſiſter to Queene Elizabeth wife of King Henry) William de la Pole brother to the ſaid Edmund Earle of Suffolke, Sir Iames Tirrel, Sir Iohn Windham Knights, with other, were attached, and committed to cuſtodie, and afterward alſo * George Neuil Lord Abergenie, and Sir Thomas Greene Knight, were likewiſe apprehended, but were ſoone deliuered. The Earle of Deuonſhire, though innocent (for it is the miſery of ſuch great men, that their owne innocency cannot alwayes procure their owne ſafety; but their birthright many times, and often other mens deſignations without their leaſt priuity, is enough to hazard them, yea it is in the power of any conſpirator by bare nomination, to doe as much, ſo that it concernes them to haue an eye not to their owne onely, but to the behauiour alſo of their whole Alliances and dependancies) this Earle (I ſay) though innocent, remained Priſoner during this Kings life, and ſome yeeres of his ſonnes raigne, who ſet him at liberty. The other, William the Earle of Suffolkes brother, had not ſo ſtrict an hand holden ouer him. But Sir Iames Tyrrell, Lieutenant of Guines Caſtell, and Sir Iohn Wyndham, Welbourn, ſeruant to Sir Iames Tyrrel, Curſon a Purſeuant, Mathew Ionas yeoman, and a Shipman were condemned of treaſon for aiding the Earle of Suffolke. The * two Knights were beheaded at Tower hill. The Shipman quartered at Tiburne: * Curſon and Ionas ſuffered death at Guines.

(68) This ſo round and quicke dealing with the Earles complices and fauourers, ſtartled his ſhallow and raw inuentions, and made their whole bulke to ſwarue and ſplinter; but the King reſted not ſo; for vpon the Sunday before the feaſt of SS. Simon and Iude

Iude, in the ſame yeere, of the ſaid executions, there was publiſhed at Pauls Croſſe, by the Kings procurement from Pope Alexander the ſixth, a Bull of * Excommunication and curſe againſt the ſaid Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Curſon, and fiue other perſons by ſpeciall name, and generally all other which aided the Earle againſt the King to the diſturbance of the Kingdome. Thus did the moſt prudent Henrie purſue his enemies, not onely with ſecret countermines and open weapons of Law, before they could aſſemble to make any ſhew, but alſo with ſpirituall lightening; which doubtleſſe, had they beene vpon iuſt cauſe, and by lawfull authoritie fulminated, ought infinitely to bee dreaded of good Chriſtians, becauſe (as Saint Paul ſaith) they deliuer ouer to Satan. Sir Robert Curſon was named, of purpoſe, to make the Earle ſecure of him; which may well be called a perillous, if not a prophane deuiſe, though his Holineſſe were made the inſtrument thereof. Neither did the King leaue heere, for by his letters and meſſengers he ſo preuailed with Pope * Alexander, as hee decreed by his Bull, *That no perſon ſhould afterward haue priuiledge of Sanctuary, who had once taken the ſame, and come foorth againe: and that, * if any Sanctuarie-man ſhould afterward commit any murther, robbery, ſacriledge, treaſons, &c. he ſhould by lay force bee drawne thence to ſuffer due puniſhment.* This was of great vſe to the King, and preſerued many ſubiects from precipitation, for the abuſe of Sanctuaries had beene an efficient of many troubles. But the ſame Pope (hauing ſent Iohn Giglis his Receiuer, to gather mony in England) ſhewed himſelfe much more fauourable to ſuch as perpetrated thoſe ſaid hainous offences, as alſo, Vſury, ſimony, rapines, adulteries, or whatſoeuer offences (excepting certaine offences againſt the Pope and Clergy, &c.) when he ſent a * Bull of pardons (for money) to all ſuch offendors in England; diſpenſing alſo thereby, with ſuch, as kept away, or by any fraud had gotten the goods of other men, which they ſhould now retaine ſtill without ſcruple of conſcience, ſo as they paid a ratable portion thereof, vnto his Holineſſe Receiuers. Sir Robert Curſon (though before acourſed by the Pope) returnes, when he ſaw fit time, into England, and withall into wonted fauour with his Soueraigne. The Earle, ſeeing himſelfe thus ſtript of all hope to doe much harme, wandred about Germany and France to finde repoſe, but in the end quite tyred, he put himſelfe into the grace and protection of Philip then in Flanders who by the death of Iſabella was King of Spaine, in right of Ioan his wife, eldeſt daughter of Ferdinando and Iſabella; where hee remained in baniſhment, till King Phillip was driuen by tempeſt in the moneth of Ianuary into England, as hee meant to haue paſſed through the ſleeue, or Engliſh Ocean, into Spaine, there to take poſſeſſion of that Kingdome and other the appertinances.

(70) The chiefe Ship of the Nauie Roiall, wherein the King was, and two other (all the reſt being ſcattered by the fury of the weather into ſeueral places and other Ports of England) thruſt into Harbour at * Falmouth. Himſelfe weary and ſicke with the violent toſſings of the Sea (whereunto hee had neuer as it ſeemes, beene vſed,) would needes come on ſhore, and refreſh his ſpirits, though the principall men about him diſſwaded that courſe, as foreſeeing it would procure a longer ſtay, then the nature of their occaſions would perhaps well beare. And ſo indeed it fel out, for being now in another Princes (though his friends) dominions, where he had no power ouer himſelf, nor others, & the rumor of arriuall ſtirring the men in authority thereabout, Sir Thomas Trenchard Knight with the ſuddē forces of the Coūtrey, not knowing what the matter might bee, came thither, and vnderſtanding the royall quality of the perſon, inuited him with all humble humanity to his houſe, and foorthwith diſpatched poſtes to Court; not long after Sir Iohn Caro Knight (with a great troupe of armed men) repaired alſo, purſuing the like humble entreaties; which the King, fearing conſtraint, becauſe they were but ſubiects and durſt not let him paſſe without their Lord and Maſters leaue neceſſarilie yeelded vnto. Vpon notice of this mightie Princes caſuall arriual, King Henry preſently commanded the Earle of Arundel to entertaine him till himſelfe could come, who very magnificently did ſo, with * three hundred Horſes by Torch-light; and in the meane while King Henry himſelfe prepares. Philip perceiuing, that whatſoeuer ſpeed his affaires required, yet now there was no remedy but to ſtay, thought not good to expect his approach, but to preuent it, and came vpon the ſpurre to Windſore, that he might be gone againe the ſooner, after whom Queene Ioan his wife came leaſureably. The reſt of this entertainement, becauſe it hath matter of weight, and is well ſet downe by Polidor Vergil, it ſhall ſuffice vs to follow his footſteps. At Windſore, the two Kings, after long and ſeuerall diſcourſes, beganne to conferre about renewing their league. Henry required that Edmund Earle of Suffolke might be deliuered vp into his power, which Philip denied to be a thing that he could doe, as holding it moſt vnreaſonable to be the author of his death, whom he had taken into Protection: but when at the laſt he found, that no excuſe nor reaſon, could ſatiſfie, for that, Henrie voluntarily offered to ſaue the Earles life, he promiſed to doe therein what he deſired, and preſently tooke order for his ſending ouer. According whereunto, King Henry (to draw out the time, till he had the wiſhed prey) conueied King Philip to London, to ſhew him the head City of his kingdome, out of which after a little ſtay hee reconducted him. The Earle in the meane time, who conceiued horror at the firſt newes of King Philips landing in England, as fatall to him, and reſolued that no hope was longer to be repoſed in the faith of forraine Princes, came ouer not vnwillingly, preſuming that after pardon of life, hee might alſo in time regaine his liberty; or if that hope failed, yet ſhould he at leſtwiſe obtaine to die, and bee buried in his Countrey. But King Philip and his Queene, hauing feaſted with her ſiſter the Princeſſe of Walles, departed England. The Earle was brought through Flanders to Calleis vpon the ſixeteenth of March, and landed at Douer vpon the foure and twentieth of the ſame, conueighed thither by Sir Henrie Wiat, and Sir Iohn Wiltſhire, with threeſcore men in armour of the Garriſon of Calleis; and at Douer Sir Iohn Louel and others receiuing him, guarded him ſafe to the Tower of London. King Philipp, not long after his landing in Spaine deceaſed, being not thirtie yeeres old. That tempeſt which draue him into England was holden by the people as prodigious; for it blew down the golden Eagle from the famous Spire of Pauls Steeple (being of Copper richly ouerguilt, of fourty pounds weight, in length foure foote, and in breadth three,) which alſo in the fall thereof, brake and battered the ſigne of the Blacke Eagle, in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where now the Schoolehouſe ſtands. This accident euen then made ſome coniecture, that the Emperour Maximilian (whoſe Imperiall Enſigne the Eagle is) ſhould ſuffer ſome loſſe accordingly (ſaith Polydore) as indeed he did by the death of King Philippe his ſonne. Which (if any ſuperſticiouſly delight in Calculations of that blind nature) we may well parallell with that * lightning which ſtroke the letter C. out of Caſar in the inſcription of Caſar Auguſtus his ſtatue; wherupon it was gathered, that Auguſtus ſhould liue but one hundreth daies after, and then bee called a God, (Æſar the remaining ſyllables ſo ſignifying in the old Hetruſcan tongue,) which accordingly hapned.

(69) Thus was the Earle of Suffolke brought backe, and the King anchored his quiet at the ſafe cuſtody of his perſon within the Tower. The other wordly point wherein he chiefely beſtowed his ages care, was to gather money, though by courſes ſeeming very grieuous and full of bitterneſſe; the too griping griping greedinesse, and too-profuse lauishnesse of money in Princes, being both alike offensiue to a well setled estate. Some excuse his doings herein (amongst whom Polydor is chiefe) as not proceeding from any deprauation or vncorrected affection of his nature; but from an opinion and forecast of generall profite: because a Princes humor of gathering, tendeth, though with distast of particular men, to the good publike, whereas his profusenes, though with some particular mens profite, endeth in the empouerishment of the whole. And Henry himselfe protested (saith Polydor) hee did it not for loue of money, but with a purpose to bridle the fierce minds of a nation bred vp among factions: though they (saith the same author) who felt the smart, and were wounded by his Instruments, *cried out they were not so much the darts of seuerity, which did hit them, as of auarice. Yet Polydors Apologie may be current: for it is not to bee doubted, but that such vse the King might propound himselfe; and yet withall, we can hardly find any commendable root thereof, the wayes being so importune and harsh, by which hee raised money. Let vs heare in this point the obseruatiue *Knight. Of nature (saith hee) Henry coueted to accumulate treasure, which the people (into whom there is infused, for the preseruation of Monarchies, a naturall desire to discharge their Princes, though it bee with the vniust charge of their Counsellors and Ministers) did impute vnto Cardinall Morton, and Sir Reinald Bray, who (as it afterward appeared) as Counsellors of ancient authority with him, did so sound his humor, as neuertheless they tempered it. Where it is truly said, it afterward appeared: for till they were gone to account to God, and his feare for the maine quite banished, the king did not let loose the reines to his immoderate desire of hauing, which yet was not more sinnefull, then the meanes vnder him practised, were odious. *For Empson and Dudley that followed, being persons that had no reputation with him, otherwise then the seruile following of his owne humors, gaue him way, and shaped him meanes to those extremities, whereby himselfe was touched with remorse at his death, and which his successor disauowed. And this we take to be a true iudgement. To bee particular in the recitall of thinges worthy to die in forgetfulnesse, is not onely to recite, but in a sort to teach them also, as some, who by broad inuectiues, haue as it were read a lecture of those vices, against which they haue pretended to inueigh. But publike and shamefull Arts may more safely be deliuered. The instruments whome the King set on worke (or who perhaps set the King on worke) were *two Lawyers, Richard Empson (afterward knighted) and Edmund Dudley Esquier; their employment was to cal the richer subiect into queon for breach of old penall lawes, long before discontinued and forgotten, whereby they brake in vpon the people, as it were at vnaware, like a kind of authorized robbers, masked vnder the pretext of seruice for the King, and the names of Delators or Promoters, a * familiar sickenesse in the times of ancient Tyrannies. But the courses to execute their employment, were voide of all conscience and colour. For one of them was to outlaw persons secretly, and then to seise their estates, driuing them to chargefull compositions with the King, and heauy bribes to the Authors of their trouble. More detestable was another practise of theirs. For *there were false Iurors and ringleaders of false Iurors, who would neuer giue any verdict against the will of their patrons, the said Empson and Dudley; so that if any durst stand out vpon triall, the destiny of their causes was squared forth by the leaden rule of those fellowes consciences; which to bee a truth, the expiatory punishment which K. Henry the eight tooke of them in the first yeare of his raigne, doth clearely conuince. By these meanes many honest and worthy subiects were rigorously fined, imprisoned, or otherwise afflicted, which filled the land with sorrow and repinings. Among very many others thus abused Sir William Capell Alderman of London was eminent, as from whom, in the tenth yeer of the kings raign, had beene scruzed, vnder the colour of moth-eaten and vnreuiued Lewis, aboue sixteene hundreth pounds sterling, and was now againe plaide at a-fresh, and another hand drawne vpon him for two thousand pounds, which because he would not pay, hee was by Dudley commaunded prisoner to the Tower; but by the death of the King which ensued, all such prisoners were released. If any perhaps will slight the hard vsage extended to Citizens, and to the like, they are vnwise therein, neither thinke as Patriots ought. For though it may so fall out that the personall vexation of some few, merits no great pitty; yet the example is pestilent; and it is a part of the cunning, to choose out at first such for patternes, as vpon whose persons least compassion may fall, which examples may afterward bee extended to whomsoeuer. These reuels and rages against the wealthier sort continued, till it pleased God to sting the Kings heart with iust compunction, toward the horror of his death; who had the fauour from heauen, as to lie sicke of a consuming disease, which wasted him by such insensible degrees, as gaue him the vse of his whole selfe (as it were) till the last gaspe, whereby hee had meanes to recollect himselfe, after those many soule-wounding assaults which attend regall greatnesse, and to submit his thoughts to such ghostly admonishments (touching another life) whereunto in dayes of health, the hearts or eares of great Princes are seldome attentiue.

(71) About the yeere of his death, hauing vnderstood that Lewis King of France, despairing of issue male, had annulled the Contracts made betweene Charles King of Spaine (sonne of the late King Philip, and afterward elected Emperour by the name of Charles the fifth) and the Lady Claudia his eldest daughter, whom he newly betrothed to Francis of Valois Dolphin of France, and Duke of Angolesme; King Henry (whose care for preseruation of the common quiet, and good of his Country, by forrain alliances, was euer holy in him and awake) thought it a faire occasion for him to match his younger daughter the Lady Marie. The French King to haue the aduise of Iames the fourth King of Scots, in the bestowing the said Madam Claudia his eldest daughter, had before sent Bernard Steward Lord Dobigny, and the President of Tholouz, Ambassadors for that purpose; who finally in effect receiued this answere: * That the said King Iames thought it best that his eldest daughter should be married within his owne Realme of France, for if she were married vpon any forraine Prince, it might giue colour to claime title to the said Realme afterward. And if he did marrie her at home, rather to him the said Francis, whom he had appointed to succeed then any other. Which resolution was very acceptable to K. Lewis, because it iumped with his owne purpose, and it was followed accordingly. King Henry therefore hearing that King Charles might bee obtained, so pursued the point * by the prudent managing of Richard Fox (now Bishoppe of Winchester) his Ambassadour, that King Charles his Ambassadors comming out of Flanders, where hee was educated, and meeting him at Calais, the affaire was opened, disputed, concluded, and the Lady Mary then about ten yeeres of age (as King Charles himselfe) was by solemne contract assured to him for wife.

(72) Now therefore his sonne Henrie Prince of Wales, being heire of the Crowne, and married; his eldest daughter, the Lady Margaret, Queene of Scotland; the Lady Mary his youngest, prouided for so highly (though in the end it came to nothing) all likelihood of perill by competitors, or busie Factionists, buried in the Tower, by the emprisonment of Edmund Earle of Suffolke; his people tractable and calme; his coffers full, and the state of things ripe for a successour: death (the executioner of the Almighties sentence,) was ready to discharge him of

of the prison of his flesh. Before he departed, * well disposed persons tendering the health of his soule, did both in sermons, and otherwise, informe him of the excommunications against informers; Wherefore he of his blessed disposition, granted to all men generall pardons, certaine onely excepted. In his life time hee founded the goodly Hospitall of the Sauoy, built sixe religious Houses for Franciscan Friers, three of them for Obseruants, and the other three for Conuentuales. Of his building also was Richmund Pallace, and that most beautifull peece, the Chappell at Westminster, the one the place of his death, and the other of his buriall: which formes of more curious and exquisite building, he and Bishoppe Foxe, first (as is reported) learned in France, and thence brought with them into England. He died about the age of fiftie two yeeres, vpon the two and twentieth of * April hauing raigned twenty three yeeres and eight moneths. A right noble, wise, victorious and renowned King, and one whose piety would haue beene farre more eminent, then all his other vertues, if from the beginning the malignant quality of the times, would haue permitted him to liue in quiet. He specially honoured the remembrance of that Saint-like Man, Henry the sixth, the founder of his Family, and Propheticall fore-teller of that fortune which now hee died seised of, whom also he laboured to haue * Canonized for a Saint, but that Pope Iulio held that honour at two high a rate. It is reckoned by some writers * of that age among his principall glories, that three Popes, Alexander the sixth, Pius the third, and Iulius the second, did in their seuerall times, with authority and consent of the Cardinals, elect and chose him for chiefe defensor of Christs Church, before all other Christian Princes. In his last will and Testament, after the disposition of his soule and body, hee deuised and willed Restitution should bee made of all such monies, as had vniustly beene leuied by his Officers. A most pious and truly Christian care, wherby also appeareth, that hee hoped the wrongs done vnder him were not so enormous nor innumerable, but that they might fall within the possibility of redresse. The description of his whole man, is had in the beginning of his life, and the course thereof described in his Actions. There remaine of his wisdome many effects, and those as his fame likely to continue for euer.

His Wife.

(71) Elizabeth the first Childe Legitimate, and eldest daughter of King Edward the fourth, was at the age of nineteene vpon the eighteenth of Ianuarie and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1485. married vnto King Henry the seuenth, whereby was vnited the long contending Families of Lancaster and Yorke, and the Roses red and White ioined into one, to the great ioy of the English Subiects. Shee was crowned at Westminster vpon the fiue and twentieth of Nouember, the third of her husbands Raigne, and of Grace 1487. Shee was his wife eighteene yeeres and twenty foure daies, and died in childebed in the Tower of London, the eleuenth of February, euen the day of her owne Natiuity, the eighteenth of her husbands Raigne, and yeere of our Saluation, 1503. and is buried at Westminster in the most magnificent Chappell and rich Monument of Copper and gilt where shee with her husband lie entombed.

His Issue.

(72) Arthur the eldest sonne of King Henrie the seauenth and of Queene Elizabeth his wife was borne at Winchester the twentith day of September, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred eighty sixe, and the second of his Fathers raigne. In whose fifth yeere he was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall and Earle of Chester; and at the age of fifteene yeeres, one month and twenty fiue daies, vpon the foureteenth of November, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and one, espoused the Lady Katherine daughter to Ferdinando King of Spaine, shee being then about eighteene yeeres of age, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, London; and presently sent into Wales the better to gouerne that principality by his owne Presence, enioyed his marriage bed onely foure moneths and nineteene daies, departing this life at Ludlow the second of Aprill, the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and two, of his Fathers raigne seuenteene, and of his owne age fifteene yeeres, sixe moneths and thirteene daies. His body with all due funerall solemnities, was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Maries in Worcester, where, in the South side of the Quire he remaineth entombed in Touch, or Iette, without any remembrance of him by picture.

(73) Henrie the second sonne of King Henrie the seuenth and of Queene Elizabeth was borne at Greenwich in the Countie of Kent, the two and twentieth of Iune, in the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninety and one, being the seuenth of his Fathers raigne. In his Infancy he was created Duke of Yorke and Marshall of England, and so trained vp in his youth to literature as hee was rightly accounted the best learned Prince in Europe, and by the death of his brother succeeded his Father in all his Dominions; whose Raigne and Acts are presently to be related.

(74) Edmund the third sonne of King Henry and of Queene Elizabeth, was borne in the yeere of Christ, one thousand foure hundred ninetie fiue, and in his young yeeres was created Duke of Sommerset, which Title hee no long time enioyed, being taken away by death at Bishops Hatfield before hee attained fully to fiue yeeres of age, the yeere of Grace, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and fiue, and fifteenth of his Fathers Raigne, and his body lieth interred at Saint Peters in Westminster.

(75) Margaret the eldest daughter of King Henrie and of Lady Elizabeth his Queene, was born the nine and twentieth day of Nouember the yeere of Christ 1489. and fifth of her fathers raigne; shee at the age of foureteene was married vnto Iames the fourth King of Scotland, the yeere of our Lord one thousand fiue hundred and three, vnto whom shee bare Iames the fifth, Arthur and Alexander and a Daughter: which last three, died all of them young; and after the death of King Iames (being slaine at Flodden Field in fight against the English,) shee was remarried vnto Archibald Douglas Earle of Angusse, in the yeere of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred and foureteene, vnto whom shee bare Margaret, afterward espoused vnto Mathew Earle of Lennox, Father by her of the Lord Henrie, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lyeth interred in the vpper ende of the Chancell in the Parish Church of Stepney neere London, vpon whose Graue is engrauen in brasse, as followeth:

> Heere lieth Henry Steward Lord Darle of the age of three quarters of a yeere, late Sonne and Heire of Mathew Steward Earle of Lennox and Lady Margaret his wife, which Henrie deceased the XXVIII. day of Nouember in the yeere of our Lord God. 1545. whose Soule Iesus pardon.

Her second sonne was Henrie Lord Dernley a Noble Prince; and reputed for person one of the goodliest

Gentlemen of Europe, who married Marie Queene of Scotland, the royall Parents of the moſt roiall Monarch Iames the firſt King of great Britaine, and of the Britaine World. And her third ſonne was Charles Earle of Lennox father vnto Lady Arbella.

(76) Elizabeth the ſecond daughter of King Henry and Lady Elizabeth his Queene was borne the ſecond day of Iuly, one thouſand foure hundred ninety two, and died the foureteenth of September and yeere of Chriſt, one thouſand foure hundred ninetie fiue, and is interred at Weſtminſter.

(77) Mary the third bloſſome of the Imperiall Roſe-tree of England, was firſt wife to Lewis King of France, who liued not long after, and died without iſſue by her. Her ſecond husband was that Martiall and pompous Gentleman, Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke.

(78) Katharine fourth daughter of this ſeuenth Henry and of Elizabeth his Queene, was borne vpon Candlemas day, in the yeere of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and three, and in the eighteenth yeere of her fathers raigne, who was called to her part in a far better Kingdome within a ſhort while after.

CHAPTER XXI.

THe rich and wiſe King (Henry the ſeuenth) gone (as is ſaid) the way of all fleſh, his ſonne bearing the ſame name, a moſt magnanimous & heroical Prince, ſucceded in his Throne ouer al his dominions, as the only true heir vnto the Crowne, by both the houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke. His birth was at Greenwich in the yeere of Grace, 1491. the twentieth two of Iune: and his youth ſo trained vp in literature, that he was accounted the moſt learned Prince of all Chriſtendome, induced with parts moſt befitting a King, both in lineaments of body, and liberality of minde, beſides his ripe knowledge in politicke affaires, and was made the more agreeable to the affections of men, by the conſideration of his flouriſhing age, as hauing not attained vnto nineteen at his fathers death. In his infancy hee was created Duke of Yorke; at twelue yeeres (his brother deceaſed) Prince of Wales, and at eighteene became ſole Monarch of the land, when at Weſtminſter vpon Sunday the twenty fift of Iune, euen the feſtiuall of Saint Iohn Baptiſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1509. hee with his beauteous Queene Katherine receiued their Crowns at the hands of William Warham Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, no Prince giuing better hopes vnto iuſtice, or ſeeking the wealth of his ſubiects more then himſelfe.

Theſe men, King Henry the ſeuenth had made his Inſtruments for the finding out of offenders in his penall Statutes, themſelues being learned in the lawes, and apt inough to execute their Commiſſions to the full: for, by their daily informations and recouering of fines, they digged and brought a ſiluer Mine into the Kings Exchequer, ſome veines whereof by the way, ranne alſo into their owne coffers, to the great vexation of all, and vtter vndoing of many; whereat the Noblemen grudged, the Gentility repined, the Commons lamented, and all of them felt the teeth of theſe rauening Wolues: But the father King departed, and his ſonne ſet on his throne; the complaintes of the oppreſſed ſo oppreſſed the King and his Councell, that Dudley and Empſon were ſent priſoners to the Tower, and both of them by Parliament attainted of Treaſon.

(3) Edmund Dudley by deſcent was a Gentleman, and by profeſsion a Lawyer, hauing both wit and wordes at will, had hee not abuſed both to his own deſtruction. Richard Empſon his inferiour by birth, was the ſonne of a poore Sieue-maker, but yet had hee ſtepped before him to the degree of a Knight: Theſe night-ſprung Muſhrumps that ſucked the earthes fatneſſe, from far better plants then themſelues, ſaw not the many hands ready to plucke vp them by the rootes, when the ſeaſon ſhould ſerue to cleare the land of ſuch weedes: for albeit they had their diſcharge vnder the Kings owne hand to doe what they did, and their ſeruice knowne Crowne ſeruice, a matter impugnable, yet no ſooner were they left to ſtand vpon their owne baſis, but that they felt the weight of their done wrongs too importunable for them any longer to beare; for ſo importune were all degrees againſt them, that Dudley forthwith in Guild-hall London was arraigned and condemned to die: and King Henry in progreſſe, (through the cry of the people) could take no pleaſure, til he had ſent for Empſon into Northamptonſhire, where among them hee was arraigned, and receiued ſentence of death, which was ſo deſired and followed, as to ſatisfie his Subiects, the King ſent a ſpeciall writ for their executions, which with great ioy of all was performed vpon Tower hill, by taking from them their heades; when they left their riches to be ſpent by others, and their names to remaine vpon Record for the Caterpillers of thoſe times: whoſe like if any ſuch liue, ſhall leaue their hatefull remembrance to the like ſtaines of reprochfull infamy, how pleaſing ſoeuer the promotion ſo gotten in their owne eyes ſhall ſeeme, or the employments in their ſelfe conceites accounted profitable to the State.

(4) This iuſtice of King Henry wanne him great praiſe of his people, and his charity extended towards London, when that City was ſore diſtreſſed with famine, by ſending ſixe hundred quarters of corne, great loue, ſo that neuer any King entred his raigne with better hopes then himſelfe. That his perſon was tall, is not to bee doubted, though not like vnto Saules, as ſome haue alleadged, whoſe report is, that at the ſiege of Bulloigne, he was higher by the head then any in his Campe, and euery ioint proportionable to ſo royall a ſtature: but that hee was ſtrong, his many Iuſts and Tilts, and fights at Turney (moſt dangerouſly performed) was manifeſted vpon them that vnderwent his heauy hand: for at Tilt hee bare downe a man at Armes both horſe and all, and threw Sir William Kingſton a Knight of great ſtrength to the ground at Barryers; with battell-axe he combated againſt one Giot a Germane very ſtrong and tall, and lent him better blowes then he could againe repay.

(5) His glorie thus mounted the Trophie of fame, and young Henry the onely morning ſtarre in this Weſterne Orbe, Pope Iulius the ſecond, fearing the further incroch of the French, who then had entred into ſome part of Italy, thought this Prince the ſtrongeſt pillar whereunto to truſt, and the fitteſt Carde to trumpe the French King, well knowing the Title that the Engliſh Kings had vnto France, and the readineſſe of his Subiects to forward that way: whereupon writing his letters vnto King Henry, complained againſt Lewis the French king, and twelfth of that name, who neither (as hee alleadged) eſteeming of God, good fame, nor conſcience, detained the reuenewes of the Clergy, ſupported the Cardinall William to aſpire the Papacy, aided in the ſiege of Bonen, Alfonſo of Ferrara, and the Benteuoly, both traitors to the Papal Sea, where hee intended to lay the foundation of his Empire, to vſurpe all Italy, beſought him for the pity of our Sauiour, and by the vertue of his famous anceſtors, (for I vſe the words of the Popes briefe) that neuer forſooke the Church of God in diſtreſſe, and by the filiall obedience, the ſtrongeſt bond, to enter into the holy league, they hauing elected him againſt Lewis, Caput fœderis Italici.

(6) And indeed to ſpeake as it was, Lewis much emulated King Henries greatneſſe, fearing that fortune would giue him occaſions to make his claime by ſword vnto the Kingdome of France; which the ſooner hee did by this holy fathers inſtigations, and by his Herauld Clarentius roughly demanded, the Dutchies of Normandy, Guyen, Anion and Maine, and with them alſo the Crowne that king Lewis ware. The Scotiſh king likewiſe, in caſe of Andrew Barton ſlaine in his Piracies (as the Engliſh alleadged) by the Admirall of England, accounted the truce broken, and ſought the reuenge vpon the Borders adioining. Againſt theſe two nations yong Henry at once prepared, and happily obtained faire victories againſt both: but the ſucceſſe of the one, (though not following preciſely the time) we meane to relate before wee enter diſcourſe of the other.

(7) The enterpriſe great which K. Henry meant to vndergoe, hee thought it good wiſdome to ioyne amity with Maximilian the Emperour, Ferdinando King of Spaine, and many other Princes, holding alſo correſpondency with Pope Iulius the ſecond, that buſie Pontificall Prelate of Rome: then propounding his purpoſes in Parliament, ſent ouer certaine Nobles before him into France, and afterward followed them himſelfe, pitching downe his Tents before the Towne of Terwin, where he raiſed his royall Standard of the Red-dragon, and begirt the Citie with a ſtrait ſiege.

(8) To this place Maximilian the Emperour repaired, and to the great honour of Henry entred into his pay, wearing the Croſſe of Saint George, with a roſe (the Kings badge) as his faithfull Souldier, and receiued wages by day for euery of his, according to their degree: The French ſeeing the Towne in diſtreſſe, ſought the reliefe with victuals, and men, but were ſo encountred by the king and his company, as that many of their chiefeſt Captaines were taken, and ſixe of their Standards wonne, the reſt for ſafeguard of life ſo poſted away, that this conflict was called the battell of Spurres.

(9) Then was the battery broght ſo neer their wals, that many breaches were therein made, and the Towne by compoſition yeelded vnto the King; whereupon the Earle of Shrewsbury was ſent to ſee all things ſafe, who ſtucke vpon the higheſt Turret the Banner of Saint George, and tooke the oath of alleagiance of all the French Citizens, to acknowledge King Henry their ſupreme Lord: This done, the King as a Conquerour entreth Terwine, ſent thence their their Ordinance, dismounted the Turrets, cast downe the walles, filled vp the ditches, and fired the Towne, excepting onely the Cathedrall Church and Bishops Pallace.

(10) Then was the siege remoued vnto Turnay: about which City King Henry commanded diuers Trenches to bee cast, and placed his Ordinance to such aduantage, that none might enter in, or come out of the same. Into this Towne a great number of the French from the Countries adioining had lately fled, relying much vpon the strength and safety of the place, which indeed had euer beene accounted so inuincible, that this sentence was engraued ouer one of the gates. Iamais ton me a perden ton pucellage, thou hast neuer lost thy maiden-head: Notwithstanding, it was yeelded vp vnto Henry with ten thousand pounds sterling for the Citizens redemption, who to the number of foure score thousand, then tooke their oathes to become his true Subiects, and foure of their principall bare vp the Canopie vnder which the King in triumph-wise entred, hauing born before him his sword, axe, speare, and other abiliments of warre, euery Citizen holding a staffe-Torch for his light. The safe keeping of this City, the King committed to Sir Edward Poinings Knight of the Order of the Garter, whom hee there made his Lieutenant, and ordained Thomas Wolsey his Almoner the Bishoppe of Turnay. The yeere now spent, and season vnfit for the fielde, a surceasse from warre was determined vntill the next spring; whereupon all were shipped for England with full payment, and praise, but Terwin and Turnay stucke heauily vpon the French mens hearts.

(11) King Lewis thus endammaged in his owne Dominions, thought it best policy to pay like for like, to which end at the first attempts against Terwine hee solicited Iames the fourth of that name, King of Scotland (though brother by marriage vnto King Henry of England) to disturbe the peace of his Subiects, that so hee might bee drawne out of France; which Iames for his part put presently in practise: for writing his letters to Henry in the French Kings behalfe, charged him with breach of Truce, both in the case of his Scots slaine at the sea, as also against his Confederates the Duke of Gelder, and King of France, against which last he desired him to desist, otherwise hee should bee forced to reuenge the Frenches wrongs vpon his English: and to giue letters of Mart to recouer the losses of his Subiectes.

(12) King Henry a Prince of a Maiesticall spirite, most highly offended at these his brothers requests, and threates, was so farre ouergone with fury and rage, that Lions King at Armes the bringer, was thereby somewhat daunted at his present answere, which he desired might be sent in writing, refusing to carry in words his reply to his Soueraigne. This Heralds wise and weighty request, was forthwith granted, and letters framed to King Iames demands, answering those imputations with rough and round words, which notwithstanding hee neuer read or saw, being slaine in the battell of Flodden, before that Lions could come to deliuer the same.

(13) For Iames King of Scots preparing for war, had in the meane while entred the borders, and with his Ordinance battered and wonne the Castell of Norham; making still forward vpon the English. Against whom Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey made the Kings Lieutenant of the North, at his going into France, assembled an Army of twenty sixe thousand strong, vnto whom came his sonne the Lord Admirall of England, with a great supply of good souldiers well appointed for warre. The Earle from Newcastell came vnto the water of Till, and pitched his battell besides a little Towne called Brankeston, vnder Flodden hill, a mountaine lying in the North of Northumberland, betwixt the riuers of Till and Tweed, where vpon a rising banke, the Scottish hoast had taken the aduantage of the ground; vnto King Iames, Thomas Earle of Surrey sent Rouge Croſſe a Pursuant at Armes, with proffer of battell to bee done vpon Friday the ninth of September; if so it pleased his Highnesse, who withall carryed this message from the L. Admirall, that he was come in person to iustifie his Act against Andrew Barton, and would abide the last drop of his bloud in the Vant-gard of the field.

Lord Howard profereth battel vnto K. Iames.

(14) King Iames most readily accepted the offer, and by his Herauld Hay sent the Earle word, that if he were as then in Edenbrough, yet would hee most gladly come to fulfill his desire; and withall sent his letters for the iust occasions giuen him to inuade England as hee did. The day approached, and the Scots keeping the higher ground, the Earle marched vpward along the riuer, and by two Bridges passed ouer with his hoast, making still forward, as thogh he ment either to haue taken into Scotland, or else to circumuent K. Iames his returne, which hee perceiuing, hasted downe the hill, putting from him his horse, raised his roiall Standard, and as a most valiant Chiefetaine encouraged his Souldiers to the fight.

King Iames accepteth of battel.

Iohn Rosse.

(15) The Scotish Ordinance discharged from aboue, ouershot the English with very small dammage, and the ground of no difficult ascent, gaue them the easier accesse, so that Sir Edmund Howard, who lead a wing to the Vant-gard (whereof his brother the Admirall was Captain) got almost to the height; against whom the Earles of Lennox and Argile, with their Battels of Speares on foot so violently encountred, that they beat down, and brake the wing of the English, wherein many were slaine, and the horsemen disbanded, and put to flight; but presently recalled, ioyned themselues againe to the great battell, which by this time had attained to the toppe of the hill. King Iames that saw this first brunt performed, made full account that the day was his owne, supposing verily the English had fled, and therefore most valiantly he aduanced forward, not staying for the reregard to second his battel, and encountring the Earles Battalion, a bloody fight was performed, with the losse and life of many a man: but strength neere spent, and the Scotish somewhat disioyned, through force of a great shore of arrowes falling among them; Sir Edward Stanley hauing three bands reserued for the like purpose, with a fresh onset inuaded the open sides of the enemy, whose force was so violent, that the Scots no longer were able to stand, but tooke downe the hill vnto flight, which the Earles of Lennox and Argile perceiuing, did their best to stay them, and fighting most valiantly, themselues were slain in the same place.

(16) King Iames then perceiuing the wings of his Battell distressed and gone, and that the enemy began to enclose him about; with a stout resolution incouraged his men, willing thē to regard the person of their King, their own honor, their valiant Ancestors, and now their present imploiments; that their blood might bee bought deare to the English, and the Scotish valours recorded for euer in the volumes of fame for this their one daies work; & thereupon rushing among the thickest began a most eager & bloody battel, and piercing through with a strong hand went so far, that he had almost ouerthrown the Earles Standard: thus busied in doubtfull chance, the Lord Howard and Sir Edward Stanley hauing discomfited the enemy in either wing, returned in the face of the maine battell, and the Lord Dacres with his Horse-men came vpon their backes, so that the Scotish were forced to fight in a round compasse, but being ouer-laid, the Kings Standard was strucken downe, and himselfe most valiantly fighting slaine in the middest of his enemies: with whom died three Bishops, whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrewes the Kings base sonne, two Abbots, twelue Earles, and seuenteene Lords, King Iames body embalmed and buried at Shine.

(17) The next day when the Scouts had found the field cleared of enemies, and the English busied to burie their dead: the body of King Iames was found slaine among the rest, hauing receiued many bloody wounds, and most of them deadly: for his sides were stucke thicke with sharpe arrowes, his necke cut into the middest, and his left hand in two places almost cut quite off. These wounds notwithstanding he was descried, and knowne by the Lord Dacres and others to bee the King: and thereupon his body bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in lead, was solemnely brought vnto the Monastery of Shine in Surrey, where no doubt it was honourably enterred: but at the dissolution of that House, in the daies of King Edward the sixth, it was (as almost all other Monuments were) disturbed of rest, and throwne into a waste roome among old timber, stone and lead, which Iohn Stowe the Relater saith, himselfe so saw: and further declareth (let him bee the Author) that the seruants of Launcelot Young Glasier to the late Queene, being at Shine in new glasing the windowes, either vpon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the Lead, cut the head from the rest: but smelling the sweet perfumes of the balmes, gaue it to their Master, who opening the lead found therein the Head of a man retaining fauour, though the moisture were cleane dried vp, whose haire both of Head and Beard was redde, which after he had well viewed, and a while kept, he caused to bee buried in Saint Michaels at Woodstreet London, the Church of the Parish wherein himselfe dwelled.

(18) Notwithstanding this faire tale of Iohn Stow, Iohn Lesby Bishop of Rosse affirmeth, that it was held for certaine, the body thus found, was the body of the Laird Bonehard then slain in the battel: and that K. Iames was seene aliue the same night at Kelso, whence hee passed vnto Ierusalem and there spent the rest of his daies in holie contemplation: but howsoeuer it is (saith he) he neuer was seene any more in Scotland, no more then Charles Duke of Burgundy was in his Country after the Battell of Nanze: howbeit his people held a vaine opinion that hee escaped, and would againe shortly returne. This battell was fought vpon the ninth of September, the yeere 1513. and is commonly called the battell of Floddon or Flodden Field: whence with victory, the Earle Generall departed, with the embalmed Body of King Iames, whom hee presented vnto Queene Katherine, who with the Gauntlet of the slaine King sent the newes of the victorie vnto her Lord King Henrie, then lying in his siege before the Towne Terwine.

(19) But as these his proceedings went prosperously forward, and his fame daily spread in further parts, so the Flemmings (who hitherto had held side with his sailes) began to fal off suddenly, & vpon the occasion as followeth. It had beene concluded betwixt King Henrie the seuenth, and Philip King of Spaine, that Charles his eldest sonne should marry Marie the younger daughter of the English King, with a Princely Dowry agreed vpon, but shee being young, and not tenne yeeres of age, and the Castilian vnable to giue assurance of her pension assigned, that match went not forward during the life of her father, howbeit King Henrie her brother regarding greatly her honour, prouided for the marriage, and signified so much to the Counsell of Flanders: who dallied him off with many excuses, & lastly sent him word they could not receiue her that yeare.

(20) This therefore gaue Lewis King of France occasion to hammer at a peace, and making Pope Leo his, they both together put it in practise, the readier was Henry to listen thereunto, both for the loue he bore to his sister, and for the great regard he held of the Apostolike See, whence Iulius the second, and this Popes Predecessor had lately sent him a Cappe of maintenance and sword, and by decree of Councel giuen him the Title Christianissimo; which were receiued with great thanks, and solemnities. The French Kings desire was to marry the said Lady Mary, whose dowrie hee assigned to bee thirty two thousand Crownes by yeere, during her natural life, couenanting further to pay vnto King Henry her brother, the summe of one hundred thousand Crownes annually for fiue yeeres continuance.

A marriage concluded betwixt King Lewis and Lady Mary.

(21) Peace thus concluded, the Lady Marie with an honourable Company was shipped at Douer, the Duke of Norfolke, the Marquesse Dorset, and the Earle of Salisbury, being her chief conductors: whose fleet had not passed two leagues at Seas, but that a sudden tempest arose, and so violently raised the waues, as their Ships were seuered each from others, some into Flaunders, some into Callis, and hers with great difficulty strucke in at Bullen, where by Boates her traine was landed, and her selfe borne to the shore in the armes of a Knight. Thence with thirty six Ladies all their Palfreis trapped in crimson Veluet, embroidered with gold, her selfe all in Cloth of siluer, her horses and Chariots in Tissue-cloth of Gold, and Crimson veluet set with Goldsmiths worke, more like an Angell then a humane Creature, mette with King Lewis at Abuile, and there the ninth of October the marriage was solemnized; where the French so gazed at the newe Queenes beauty, as they could not cast their eies from her attractiue raies, nor the infirme King bee satisfied with any other obiect whilest shee was in presence; for (so saith Guicchardine) hee gaue him selfe ouer to much to behold her most excellent beauty, not considering her young yeeres, being not yet eighteene, with the vnequality of his owne expired; nor the constitution of his weake decaied body. For hauing beene sicke before this his marriage, and not well recouered of his lingring disease, (though he set the faireſt shew outward) liued with this his faire Queene onely eighty two daies, and then by his death left her to chooſe another husband to her best liking, which shee shortly did in her second match.

(22) For thus left a stranger in the French Court, and desirous to returne againe into England; King Henrie her brother, sent Charles Brandon the new made Duke of Suffolke, to conduct the young Queene out of France. This Duke a gallant, and of a goodly presence, so courted his Charge, and carried himselfe in the eie of her melting affections, as his loue entred deepely into her tender heart: which thing indeed King Henrie perceiued before, for which cause, as was thought, hee raised him to the grace of a Duke; howsoeuer the Gemme thus got, and too precious to bee lost, hee made her his owne, by celebration of marriage, before hee past Callis, and thence sent to intreate his Soueraignes consent, who seeing it was booteleſſe to vndoe what was done, with a light touch of reproofe allowed their nuptials. But her dowrie kept backe by the French, and other grieuances complained of, caused no little troubles betweene the two Realmes as shall be related in place conuenient. In the meane while let it not seeme ouer tedious if we briefly runne ouer the rising and height of Thomas Wolsey, that pontificall Priest, seeing that many dependances of Storie had their euents in the Acts of this man, who with the King raigned together as King, if not before him in managing the State.

Erasm. Ep.

(23) His birth was at Ipswich in the County of Suffolke, his parents poore, but of an honest report, and himselfe a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit: his education in youth was at Oxford in Maudlin Colledge, and his first preferment from the Lord Marquesse Dorset, who bestowed vpon him a benefice in his gift, in regard that hee was tutor vnto his sonnes, which Sir Amias Paulet so crosse him in, that he tied Wolsey by the feete in the Stockes though afterward hee put this his Act among other his deedes, whereof he had iust cause to repent: for

Thomas Wolsey his rising.

Marquesse Dorset Wolseis preferrer.

for the Schoolemaſter no ſooner was mounted into the Chancellorſhippe of England, but that hee laid his command vpon Paulet, and retained him as Priſoner in the Middle Temple the ſpace of 6. yeeres: but in the meane time Marqueſſe Dorſet dying, left Wolſeyes pillar of hope altogether vnpoliſhed, and the baſe thereof it ſelfe vnſetled vpon any firme ground. ſo that Wolſey now ſought his fortune in France; who comming to Calleis, became ſeruant to Sir Iohn Naphant the Treaſurer of that Towne, where hee carried himſelfe with ſo great diſcretion, as ſhortly his maſter preferred him to the King.

(24) This Scholler hauing thus caſt Anchor at Court, the hauen of hope, was more then double diligent in the Kings eye, and very ſeruiceable alſo both to Doctor Fox Biſhoppe of Wincheſter, Secretary, and Lord Priuie Seale, as alſo to Sir Thomas Louell Maſter of the Wardes, and Conſtable of the Tower: but moſt of all vnto Fortune, that now fitted occaſion to make her ſelfe famous in this poore Butchers ſonne. For King Henry hauing vrgent buſineſſe with Maximilian the Emperour, ſent this his Chaplen vnto him in Poſt, who poſted againe before hee was thought to bee gone, and withal concluded ſome points forgot in his directions, to the high content of his Soueraigne Lord the King: for the which hee beſtowed vpon him the Deanrie of Lincolne, the worthieſt promotion vnder the degree of a Biſhoppe: then was hee made the Kings Almoner, and preſently following one of the Priuy Councell; wherein his aduiſe was ſo wiſe, and his perſwaſions ſo weighty, that hee was continually imployed to be their expoſitor to the King, alwayes carrying a moſt ſpeciall regard, to preferre his Maieſties will howſoeuer it went; ſo that his mouth was the onely Organ that euer ſounded his pleaſure, and freedome from troubles of all State affaires.

(25) But warres hauing beene commenced betwixt England and France, and Turnay loſt from the obedience of Lewes, King Henry gaue his Almoner the Biſhopricke thereof, and changed his Deanery of Lincoln into the Biſhopricke of the ſame Dioceſſe, and not long after ſet alſo the Miter of Yorke vpon Wolſeyes Wiſe-head: whereby hee became (as it were) three Biſhoppes at once, and now being Primas Angliæ, carried himſelfe accordingly, by erecting his Croſſe in the Kings Court, albeit it were within the Iuriſdiction of Canterbury, which ſeemed vnſufferable; the dignity of the Church held then much by Precedency of place, and the giuing way to inferiours, accounted the infringing of all religious liberties; Wherefore William Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury found himſelfe ſore agreeued to haue the Croſſe of Yorke (which owed him obedience) aduanced with his, and that in his preſence, for which hee greatly checked the preſumption of this proud Prelate.

(26) But Wolſey not wanting wherewithall to mate him by the inſtigations of the Kings, both of England and France; obtained to bee made Prieſt, Cardinall, and Legatus de Latere, vnto whom Pope Leo ſent a Cardinals hatte, with bulles of authority in that behalfe, yet were theſe high Preſents brought in no better a caſe, then in a mean budget, which ſeemeth ſomewhat diſgracefull in the new Cardinals eye; wherefore hee commanded a ſtay to bee made of the bringers approach; and for the greater honour to this honourable preſent, arrayed him in moſt coſtly ſilkes, beſeeming ſo great an Ambaſſador, who aduancing forward, hee cauſed to be encountred by a number of gallant Gentlewomen, and a great aſſembly of Prelates vpon Blacke-heath, by whom hee was conducted with much honour through the City of London, and his Preſent deliuered at Weſtminſter, attended by many mitred Biſhoppes and Abbots, with a rich ſhew of Copes, as if it had been a Kings Coronation.

(27) Thus got before Canterbury by his power Legatiue, to weare now his hatte without controll of an equall, hee obtained the purſe with the broade Seale of England, which Archbiſhoppe Warham had enioyed long before the death of King Henry the ſeuenth, and was made Lord Chancellour in his roome; ſo that beſides the purſe and mace of that honourable Office, hee had two Croſſes and two Pillars, borne euer before him by the talleſt Prieſts that were to bee found in the Realme. To the better maintenance of his chargeable eſtate, the King beſtowed on him the Biſhopricke of Wincheſter, and in Commendam the Abbey of Saint Albanes, and with them hee held in Farme, the Biſhoprickes of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford, enioyed by ſtrangers incumbents, not reſiding in the Realm, ſo that now ſeeming a monſter with ſeuen heads, and each of them crowned with the Miter of a Biſhoppe; let vs thus leaue him dandled in Dame Fortunes lap, till ſurfetted with dalliance ſhee caſt him from thence.

(28) But the ſtate of Londons Tradeſ-men proſpered vnder his greatneſſe nothing ſo well, for ſuch was the concourſe of ſtrangers, and ſo much were they borne with, by the ſuperiors, that they abuſed the Engliſh, openly in the markets, kept from a Citizen his owne wife with his plate, yea, and paſt with a ſmall pennance for killing an Engliſhman. Theſe firſt were complained of in a Sermon at Saint Maries Spittle, and afterwards aſſaulted, and much hurt done to their ſubſtance and houſes, for which riotous offence Iohn Lincolne the onely inſtigator was hanged; and foure hundred men, boyes, and eleuen women led in ropes along the City in their ſhirts, and halters about their neckes to the Kinges Hall at Weſtminſter, where his Maieſty ſitting vnder a cloath of eſtate, pardoned the offences to the great reioycing of the Londoners.

(29) But the loſſe of Turney ſticking ſore vpon the ſtomacke of the French King, hee ſought to redeeme it againe with money, and to that end ſent his Ambaſſadors into England, where it was concluded, that the City ſhould bee deliuered vnto Frances Valois then King of France, paying for the ſame vnto Henry ſixe hundred thouſand Crownes in twelue yeeres continuance, that is to ſay, fifty thouſand Crownes a yeere, that the Duke of Albanie ſhould bee recalled out of Scotland, and that the Daulphin ſhould marry the Lady Mary King Henries young daughter, which marriage if ſo it happned not to take effect at the yeeres of conſent, then Turnay ſhould be redeliuered to the Engliſh; neither was this forgotten, that the Cardinall ſhould receiue a thouſand markes yeerly for the reuenewes of the ſaid Biſhopricke, and vpon theſe Couenants were hoſtages for further aſſurance deliuered.

(30) But peace much affected among Chriſtian Princes, and daily increaſed of moſt potent Eſtates, was very much feared would worke alteration in the authority, abuſe, and great riches of the Clergy, if Kings might haue leaſure to looke into their own charges at home. To buſie their heads therefore from all ſuſpition or iealouſies, Pope Leo the tenth deuiſed the meanes, by a preparation intended for the holy lands warres; a ſubiect in ſhew very religious, howſoeuer the former ſucceſſes had proued it not pleaſing to God, when to recouer the City once holy, and to build vp that which Chriſt by propheſie had caſt downe, as much Chriſtian bloud was ſpilt to raiſe thoſe ruinous wals, as there was morter laid to faſten the ſtones of their firſt building.

(31) To this end therefore three Legates were ſent from the holy See of Rome, one into France, another into Germany, and Cardinall Campius into England, with whom was ioyned Wolſey in Commiſſion, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinall, ſent ſtore of red cloth vnto Calleis, to make them meet followers of ſo great a Lord; and Campius landed at Douer, Wolſey cauſed the Townes thorow which he ſhould paſſe, to receiue him with proceſſion: and ſo being brought by the Gentility of Kent

Kent vnto Black-heath neere vnto Greenewich, was there mette and receiued by the Duke of Norfolke, many Knights, but many more Prelates, where in a Tent of Cloth of Gold, he shifted himselfe into his Cardinall Roabes, which was edged about with most rich Ermine, and thence rode to London, in more pompe and estate then Christ did to Ierusalem when Hosanna was sung.

Matth. 21 9.

(32) Eight Mules hee had laden with necessaries belonging, but those made no shew in proud Wolseis eies, therefore twelue more hee sent him to furnish his Pageants through the streets of London, these either wanton, or ashamed to bee wondred at, plaied the skittish Iades indeed: For in Cheape-side, as this Triumph foorth passed, these beasts by breaking their Collers and escaping their Leaders, cast their Carriages and Coffers vpon the cold ground; whose lids flying open laid most of their riches to the sight of the people. For, from some of them fell olde Breeches, Bootes and broken shooes, from others torne stockings tottered ragges, olde Iron and horse shooes, and for fainting by the way therein was bestowed, and now cast abroad, broken meate, mary-bones, rosted egges, and crusts of bread, ywisse worth the keeping: this Shipwrack made vpon the Shelues of Cheape-side, no need it was to bid the muliters to bestirre them, who like good thrifty marriners saued from spoile as much as they could, and trussing vp their trinkets, laded againe these wantons, with the wealth of the Cardinal, who (good man) was iogging on afore with his Crosses, Pillars, Gilt-axe and Mace, vnto Pauls Church, where hee was mette with many mitred Bishops, and attended vpon to Bath place, where we will leaue him, and returne to the place where wee left.

(33) The vnity agreed vpon betwixt England and France, a meeting was motioned for the two Kings, and to that ende great preparation made aswell of the one as of the other. But in the heate of this businesse, King Henry had word that Charles, his Queenes Nephew, and new made Emperour, would visit him in England, which accordingly hee did, accompanied with the Queene of Arragon, and a most Royall Traine, and was as Roiallie entertained by King Henry: the cause of his comming was to hinder the peace concluded with France, for although, this Emperour were young, and but newly established; yet was hee wise and well foresawe the hurt that this amity with France, would bring him, and therefore came in person of purpose to disswade the Kings mind and to stay his entrance with the French if he could, but finding Henry so forward in those proceeds, he baited his hooks with golden gifts to the Cardinall, and wanne him wholly to his deuotion.

(34) King Henry passing the Seas vnto Callis, met with King Frances at a place appointed, and for that purpose newly built betwixt the Townes of Guisnes, and Arde: where to describe the Iusts, Banquets, and Maskes were to fill vp (with Hall, Grafton and Holinshed) whole sides of excessiue great Cost. At Callis also the same time the Emperor, with his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutchesse of Sauoy landed, whither King Henry and his Queene repaired, to the no little grudge of the French King, though he kept it to himselfe, and consented vnto the ancient league tripertite betwixt these three Monarches, which done the Kings returned into their owne Realmes.

(35) Then was it thought best by the Cardinals aduice to repay like with like, and therefore counselled his King, to reare Charles Duke of Burbon against France and to perswade him to inuade the very heart thereof, incouraging him with sufficient pay, and making him his Champion generall of the Field; whilest the Emperor likewise held him play against Millan. And to that end was sent in way of loane to the Emperour a great summe of money, and forreine Princes sollicited to take armes against France, for effecting which, King Henry sent his Ambassadors to the States of Venice and Swissers with these instructions as followeth.

(36) That whereas in a treatie of peace it was concluded betwixt the Emperor, King Henry, and Frances the French King, that if any Controuersies should arise betwixt any two, the Prince not inuading should giue aide and assistance against the inuader: but now the Emperour being inuaded by the French Kings Captaines in the Realme of Navarre, and in his owne Countrey by Robert de la Marth, and others by his procurement, and our king (said they) being often called vpon by the Emperor, hath often entreated the French King to surcease, but hath nothing obtained besides faire words and detraction of promises. Complaining likewise that in the intercourse of these businesses, the French King contrary to his Oath had sent the Duke of Albany into Scotland (in contempt of King Henry) and to the great danger of the yong Kings death or deposition, he being the next in blood to succeed, and to the dishonour of the Queene mother, had caused a separation betwixt her and her lawfull husband the Earle of Angus. That the French King had deteined the payment compounded for the deliuery of Turnay; and kept backe the dowry of his sister Queene Dowager of France, that he had entertained the rebellious Subiects of King Henry, and spoiled his Merchants both by Land and Sea. Neither was vnremembred the danger that the Venetians stood in, if the Realmes of Naples, and Sicilie, the Seigniories of Ieans, and Millane were lost from the Empire. These therefore seemed faire proiects vnto King Henry for him to warre against France, and to that end, a generall Muster by Commission was taken of all able men from sixteene yeers and vpward, of euery Hamlet, Village, Burrough, Citie, Hundred, and Shire, throughout England, which seemed to many another Domesday Booke: and yet was there neither peace nor warre against France.

(38) Why the Titles defender of Church and Faith, were attributed vnto these two Princes is no maruell; for Charles choſen Emperour, was ſcarſly confirmed, but to purchaſe the Popes fauor, he directed forth a ſolemne Writ of Out-lawry againſt Martin Luther, who then had giuen a great blow to the Papall Crowne. And King Henry likewiſe was renowned in Rome, for writing a booke againſt the ſaid Luther: vnderpropping the tottering or downe-caſt countenance of the Popes pardons; which Luther ſhrewdly had ſhaken; the Pope therefore to ſhew himſelfe a kind father vnto thoſe his ſonnes, gaue them theſe Titles; which in truth were none other, then the ſame which they ſware vnto, when the Crownes of their Empires were firſt ſet vpon their heades. But with what acceptance his Holineſſe receiued King Henries booke, his owne Oration ſolemnely made at the deliuery thereof vnto M. Iohn Clarke the preſenter and Kings Ambaſſador, in his Conſiſtory, and in preſence of his Cardinals ſufficiently doth ſhew, the tranſlation whereof we haue inſerted as we finde it in the Originall it ſelfe.

"Wee doe receiue this booke with all alacrity: it is "indeed ſuch as there could not bee any thing ſent "vs, and our venerable brethren, more acceptable "then it is. For the King himſelfe, a moſt mighty, "moſt prudent, and moſt truely Chriſtian Prince, "wee know not whether wee may more prayſe or "admire, being the firſt that by warre with happy "ſucceſſe hath ſubdued the enemies of the Church "of Chriſt, that ſeeke to rend Chriſts coat, and at "laſt ouercomming the enemies, hath reſtored peace "to the Church of God, and to this holy See. But "now againſt ſo foule a Monſter, both to vnder-"ſtand, to bee able, and willing to write this book, "hee hath ſhewed himſelfe no more admirable to "the whole world for his elegant ſtyle, then for his "wit. We humbly giue thanks to our Creator for "giuing ſuch a Prince to defend his Church, and "this holy See, deſiring the ſame God to grant to "this his King a happy life, and all his deſires, and "after this life in his heauenly Kingdome, to keepe "for him an euerlaſting Crowne. And we ſo farre "as wee are able to entreat of God, will neuer bee "wanting to the ſaid moſt wiſe King in the faculties "granted to vs of God.

(40) To manifeſt which his readineſſe, himſelfe among his Cardinals decreed an augmentation vnto King Henries royall Stile to bee annexed vnto his others; confirming the ſame by his Bull, which that it periſh not by the deuouring teeth of Time, wee haue here publiſhed from the originall Parchment, and leaden ſeale it ſelfe, as followeth.

(41) Leo Epiſcopus ſeruus ſeruorũ Dei, &c. Leo Biſhop ſeruant of the ſeruants of God; to our moſt dearely beloued Sonne in Chriſt, Henry King of England defendor of the Faith, health and Apoſtolicall Benediction. Wee by diuine permiſſion, the chiefe ouerſeer for the gouernment of the vniuerſall Church, though vnſufficient for ſo great a worke, doe powre forth the cogitations of our heart, that the Catholike faith without which no man can attaine to ſaluation, may receiue continuall increaſe, and that thoſe good lawes and conſtitutions decreed by the wiſdome and learning of ſuch as are in authority, eſpecially the faithfull in Chriſt, for reſtraining the attempts of all that labour to oppreſſe the ſame, or by wicked lyes & fictions ſeeke to peruert and obſcure it, may proſper with perpetuall increaſe, doe beſtow our paines and vtmoſt endeuour in our office and Miniſtery. And like as the Romane Biſhops our Predeceſſors, were wont to ſhew eſpeciall fauour to Catholike Princes (according as the quality of matters and times required) eſpecially to them that in troubleſome times, when the madneſſe and perfidious dealing of Schiſmatikes and heretikes moſt of all abound, did abide conſtant and vnmoueable, not onely in ſoundneſſe of faith and pure deuotion to the holy Romane Church, but alſo as the moſt legitimate ſonnes and valiant Champions of the ſame, oppoſed themſelues both with mind and body againſt the furious madnes of Schiſmatikes and heretikes: ſo likewiſe alſo doe wee deſire to extoll your Mateſty with worthy and immortall praiſes, for your high and immortall deſerts and labours towards vs, and this holy See, wherein by Gods permiſſion wee ſit, to graut vnto it thoſe things for which it ought to watch, and driue away the Wolues from the Lords flocke, and to cut off with the materiall ſword rotten members, which infect the myſticall body of Chriſt, and to confirme the hearts of the faithfull in ſoundneſſe of beliefe. Now where of late our beloued ſonne Iohn Clarke your Maieſties Orator with vs, being in our Conſiſtory before our venerable brethren of the holy Romane Church, the Cardinals and many other Prelates of the ſame, exhibited a booke vnto vs to bee examined and allowed of vs, which booke your Maieſties ſelfe (who doth all things with diligence and nothing amiſſe) enflamed with charity and zeale to the Catholike faith, and with ardent deuotion toward vs and this holy See, hath compoſed, as a moſt worthy and ſouereigne Antidote againſt the errors of diuers heretikes, often condemned by this holy See, and of late ſtirred vp and brought in by Martin Luther; And your ſaid Orator hath alſo largely declared vnto vs, that your Maieſty is ready, and purpoſeth, like as you haue confuted the notorious errors of the ſaid Martin, by true reaſon and inuincible authorities of ſacred Scripture, and Ancient fathers, ſo you will puniſh to the vttermoſt of your power, all thoſe of your whole Kingdome, that ſhall preſume to follow, or defend them: and we haue diligently and exactly peruſed and viewed the admirable doctrine of your ſaid booke, watered with the dew of heauenly Grace, and doe heartily thanke Almighty God, from whom euery good and perfect gift doth come, who hath vouchſafed to inſpire your Noble mind, inclined to euery good thing, and to endue you with ſo great Grace from heauen, as to write thoſe things, whereby you are able to defend his holy faith, againſt ſuch a new Innouator of damned errors; and alſo incite by your example all other Chriſtian Kings and Princes, to be willing to fauour and further with all their beſt aides the Orthodoxall faith, and Euangelicall truth, whenſoeuer it bee brought into danger or doubt. And wee thinke it alſo meete, that they who haue vndertaken ſuch godly labours for the defence of the faith of Chriſt, ſhould haue all prayſe and honour of vs; and wee are deſirous, that not onely the things themſelues which your Maieſty hath written, being both of moſt ſound doctrine, and no leſſe eloquence, ſhould bee extolled and magnified with condigne commendations, and allowed and confirmed by our authority; but alſo that your Maieſty ſhould bee graced with ſuch an honour, and ſuch a Title, as that both for our time and euer hereafter all men might perceiue how gratefull and acceptable this gift of your Maieſties hath been vnto vs, eſpecially offered vnto vs now at this time. Wee, who be the true ſucceſſors of Peter, whom Chriſt at his aſcenſion into heauen left his Vicar on earth, and to whom hee committed the care of his flocke: We I ſay, who ſit in this holy ſeate, from which all dignities and titles doe flow, vpon mature deliberation had with our ſaid brethren about theſe things, haue by the generall agreement, and conſent of them decreed, to beſtow vpon your Maieſtie this title, namely, THE DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And accordingly by theſe Preſents doe inſtile you with ſuch a title, commaunding all faithfull Chriſtians, that they name your Maieſty with this Title, and when they write to you, that after the Word KING, they adioine DEFENDER OF THE FAITH. And truely wee diligently conſidering and weighing your ſingular merits, were not able to bethinke vs of a name more worthy and conuenient for your Maieſty, then the excellency and dignity of this Title, which ſo often as you ſhal heare and reade, ſo often you may call to mind this your ſingular vertue and great deſert, nor may you by this Title puffe vp your ſelf in pride, but according to your wonted prudence become more humble, and bee more valiant and conſtant in the faith of Chriſt, and in deuotion to this holy See, by which you haue beene exalted, reſpecting in the Lord the giuer of all good things, leauing this as a perpetuall and immortal monument of your glory to your children, ſhewing them the way vnto the like, that if they ſhall deſire to be graced also with such a Title, they must labour to do such works, and to follow the excellent steps of your Maiesty, whom, accordingly as you haue well deserued of vs, and this said See, together with your wife, and all your Children that shall be borne of you, or of them, we blesse with our Benediction, with a large and liberall hand in the name of HIM, from whom the power of granting this blessing is giuen vnto vs, praying and beseeching that Almighty One, who saith, By mee Kings raigne, and Princes rule, and in whose hands are the hearts of Kinges, *that hee will confirme your Maiesty in your holy purpose, and encrease your deuotion, and by your worthy endeuours for the sacred faith, so to illustrate your renowme, and make you glorious through all the world, that this our Testimony which wee haue giuen of you, adorning you with so excellent a Title, may neuer bee iudged by any to be false or vaine. Lastly, wee desire God, that after this life ended, hee would make you partakers of his eternall glorie. (42) But from these Priestly and Papall gratulations, let vs returne to leade our Story vnto temporall Princes affaires. How the Emperour Charles had beene entertained in King Henries Court, wee haue said, and now ready to depart with many rich gifts, hee repaired to Southampton, where hee tooke his shippes for Spaine, whose conductor through the narrow Seas was Thomas Earle of Surrey, Lord high Admirall of England, who hauing wafted him vnto Biscay with a gallant crew of Gentlemen, made thence saile into France, and in Britaine besieged & wonne the strong Towne Morlais, and with the Garrison Souldiers of the Marches dayly bickered with the heart-burning French, and dayly went away with the better, but new stirres arreared by the Scots, the Lord Admirall was recalled, and came to the Court, where hee declared to his Highnesse what hee had done in Britaine.

(43) King Henries businesse thus on foot in France, hee thought to pursue it with all the aduantage hee could, and first to find the Scots play, who were euer fast friends to the French, he sent the Lords Rosse and Dacres to secure the North-borders, appointing for his Lieutenant in those partes the Earle of Shrewsburie, and sent the Lord Admirall of England againe into France, who diuided his Army into three Battalions, the first whereof, was led by Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater; the Middle, the Earle conducted himselfe, with the assistance of his brother Lord Edmund Howard, and the Rereward was gouerned by Sir William Sands, and Sir Richard Wingfield both of them Knights of the Order, the Colonell of the horse was Sir Edward Guilford.

The Earle of Shrewsbury with eight and twenty thousand strong, drew likewise towards the Borders, but the Scots lying still, without further inuasion, an abstinence from warre was betwixt them concluded, which how the English kept, the sequell well shewed; for the King ordaining Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the whole Marches, he either refrained to impeach his honor by breach of truce, or else loth to be disquieted of his soft rest, made meanes to the King, to bee discharged of the office, which was forthwith bestowed (and thankefully accepted) vpon Thomas Earle of Surrey lately returned out of France, who deliuered the charge of the East & Middle Marches vnto the Lord Marquesse Dorset, and the West vnto the Lord Dacres, who presently made a road into Scotland, and returned with booty.

Holinsh. pag. Duke Albany courteous as the offer was kinde, saying hee would abide Battell if he durst giue it, and if the Duke were taken either by him or his, hee would strike off his head and send it for a present to his Master the King of England. So netled was the Earle against the French, that had raised Albany thus against England, and King Henry (as Bishop Lesly reporteth) tooke from the Scots inhabiting England all their goods, sending them into their Countrey on foote, with white Crosses sewed vpon their vppermost Garments by which they were knowne and suffered to passe. The Scots vpon the Earles answere were wonderfully enraged, and seeking the reuenge, some of them passed ouer the water, and hotly besieged the Castle of Warke, which the Englishmen as valiantly defended, and in their resistance slew almost three hundred of their French Souldiers, the Scots retyring againe to their Campe.

(50) The Regent not able to digest the Earles pill, commanded his Armie to march forward into the English Marches, wherewith the common Souldiers much reioiced, but the wiser of the Nobility vrged this in their Counsell, that hauing displaied in warlike manner, their Banners vpon the Verge of the Borders, and defended their Countrey from the spoile, they saw no great reason further to proceed, no necessity or cause mouing, besides the Quarrell of the French: and therupon repayring to the Regent, they demanded why they should proceed further, alleadging that at his commandement (yea and that willingly) they had so farre passed, for the defence of their Countrey, which was sufficient without further inuasion of the others, the time so conuenient in the nonage of their young King, and the action so dangerous, wherein all the Peeres of Scotland were assembled, to attend and suffer the doubtfull issue of warre, which euer is vncertaine, and more losse in one battell many times suffred, then gaine can be gotten in manie: whereof too too lamentable experience (said they) we haue had by King Iames, that by peace and life, brought Scotland to her best, but by his warre and death almost to the worst, therefore would we know (said the Nobilitie) whether this your intent stands with the weale of the King and vs, or else is prosecuted in the cause of your selfe and the French.

(51) The Duke making some pause, lastly replied and said; "This question would haue beene "demanded ere now: for well you know, that from "Scotland I beare my name, honour and lineage, "haue passed the Seas from the noble Realme of "France, for the loue of my Countrey, to set you in "amity which were at dissention, by whose diuision "your Realm lay prostrate to destruction and Con"queste, for whose aid you see I haue procured the "French to ioine with you against the English. A"gaine, when these warres were determined by Par"liament, you made me your Captaine, authorizing "me to inuade England with Banner displaied, then "was no question or demand of the cause; neither "haue I entred the quarrell without your agree"ment; and therefore may I iustifie my present do"ings, and yet to me it seemeth there is cause suffici"ent, with fire, sword and blood, to enter England, "if we be not too forgetfull, and will submit our "selues to dishonour and reproach: for we all know "that the Realme of Scotland is ours by inheri"tance, and that portion of the world allowed to "our Nation to enioy; how can we warre better, "then to maintaine our naturall inheritance, against "which the English giue daily attempts, with man"slaughter, murthers, thefts and spoiles: haue we not "then (thinke you) iust cause to make warre? The de"fence of a kingdome, is the office of a king, the ho"nour of the Noble, the seruice of the Souldier, and "the duty of a naturall Subiect. But be it as you "will, yet hauing so puissant an armie to auoide our "owne reproach, and encouragement of the Ene"mie, let vs campe here still on the Borders till we "see what the English men intend.

(52) But Margaret Queene of Scots soliciting her brother for a peace, these stirres brake vp for a time, as those in France did shortlie after, by the working wit of Cardinall Wolsey, who in the State affaires was euer one, which made him the more emulated, and the grieuances of the commons euer cast vpon him; in so much that it was commonly spoken he was the causer of the heauy imposition granted to maintaine the kings warres, which was so importable to the poorer sort of Subiects, as the paiment thereof was vtterly denied to the appointed Collectors, with weepings, Cursings, and great acclamations, yea and almost grew to an open rebellion: for Kent denied it to the Lord Cobham: Essex refused to commune with the commissioners: Huntingtonshire resisted, and would not heare them, London would be taxt by none but their Aldermen: and Suffolke rose vp in Armes, making pouerty their Captaine. Of these stirres when King Henry heard, he had great indignation, blaming the Counsellors, and wrote his letters vnto euery County, that no such demands should be paid: and the Cardinall to curry fauours with the Commons gaue it forth forsooth, that at his intercession the Offenders were pardoned, and the money remitted.

(53) And now more to shew his owne power, then any great cause; hee beganne to alienate the heart of King Henry against his Nephew the Emperor, and caused him to withhold pay from the Duke of Burbon his late made Generall: which was the cause of the French Kings Captiuity. For Burbon incamped within the Towne of Pauia, and besieged by the French in most warlike manner, was for want of his said pay so desperate of life, that hee attempted a most dangerous escape. In the dead of the night he set a part of his Company to assaile the enemy on that side of the Towne which was left strong, himselfe issuing secretly out of a Posterne on the contrary side. The watch but slender and the Souldiers asleepe, a great terror arose, in which the besieger turned their Ordinance to the place of the crie, when as suddenly Burbon was at their backs, and winning their Ordinance discharged them against their owners, slew their souldiers, cut downe their Tents, and by the Vice-roye of Naples was the French King taken prisoner in the Field.

(54) This fortunate successe made these Almaines more bolde, who presently with the Imperiall Ensignes marched towards Florence, and thence to Rome, vnto whose walles in one day they gaue three assaults, in the last whereof Charles Duke of Burbon their Generall was slaine; notwithstanding the City was taken and sacked; Pope Clement in the meane while, to make all sure as he thought, thundred out his Curses, and with Bell, Booke and Candle, committed those Lutherans to Hell, who neuertheless broke down that windy Bulwarke, and with great slaughter forced him with twentie three Cardinals, into the Castle of Saint Angello, where they kept them besieged from the sixt of May, vnto the tenth of December: in which time, in mocking of the Pope the souldiers to make solace, would apparell one in Pontificall attire, who somtime should blesse them, and sometime accurse them, and riding on Horse-backe with a Whore set behind him should so passe the streets, that the Pope and Cardinals might see him. These contumelies and Papall Captiuities were grieuously taken by many Christian Princes, insomuch that Caesar in Spaine forbad all Enterludes to be plaid, and Pageants prepared for ioy of the birth of his sonne, Prince Phillip, to be pulled downe. In France by the Court of Parliament the Duke of Burbon was condemned of Treason, his name and memoriall accursed, his Armes puld downe, and his Lands and goods confiscated; neither would King Henrie of England answer the Emperours letters, wherein hee excused himselfe from hauing any hand in the action.

Troubles in Ireland.

(55) Whileſt theſe things were in working at Rome, aroſe great troubles in Ireland, the Kerns caſting off all obedience, and killing the Kings ſubiects where they found them: againſt whom Thomas Howard, Earle of Surrey, Lord Lieutenant of that kingdome, made foorth his power, and followed them himſelfe with ſuch danger of life, that the viſor of his Helmet was ſhot off, as hee purſued the enemy through the deſert woods: but theſe Rebels cut off by his high valour, and warres proclaimed at one time againſt Scotland and France, the Lord Lieutenant was recalled into England; and Piers Butler Earle of Oſorie made Deputie of Ireland in his ſtead; betwixt whom, and Girald Fitz-Girald, Earle of Kildare, whoſe ſiſter hee had married, aroſe no little ſtrife and debate, which grew to that height as King Henry ſent Commiſſioners to trie and examine the differences, which was ſo cleered on Kildares behalfe, that Oſorie was diſcharged of his Office, and the Lord Fitz-girald ſworne deputy in his place; whereat Cardinal Wolſey (whoſe hand chiefly ſteered all ſtates affaires, a deadly enemy to the Earle of Kildare) was highly offended, and to vndermine the foundations of this his new Gouernment, gaue eare vnto Oſorie, who accuſed the new deputie of many miſdemeanors, among which theſe were the principall; that he winked at Deſmonds eſcape whom he ſhould haue attached by order from the King: that he grew ouer familiar with the natiue Iriſh; and that he put to death the Kings beſt ſubiects: for theſe the Lord Deputie was commanded into England, in whoſe abſence Oſory his enemie was againe choſen Lord Deputie by the Kings Counſell, but himſelfe none of the wiſeſt for polliticke Gouernment, was altogether therein ruled by his wife, and ſhee made it no courteſie to abuſe her huſbands honour againſt her natural brothers folly: who now in England muſt anſwer his demeanour before the Lords of the Counſell, and to their Table was hee brought, where the Cardinall Lord Chauncellor made his faults nothing leſſe, and thus addreſſed himſelfe againſt the Earle of Kildare.

How "many letters, what precepts, what meſſages, what "threats, haue beene ſent you to apprehend him "and yet not done? Why ſo? Forſooth I could not "catch him? Nay, nay Earle, forſooth you would "not watch him: If hee bee iuſtly ſuſpected, why "are you partiall in ſo great a charge? If not, why "are you fearefull to haue him tried? Ywiſſe, my Lord, there bee ſhrewd "bugges in the borders, for the Earle of Kildare to "feare; the Earle, nay the King of Kildare: for "when you are diſpoſed, you raigne more like then "rule in the land: where you are pleaſed the Iriſh "foe ſtandeth for a iuſt Subiect: hearts and hands, "liues and lands are all at your courteſie: who ſaw-"neth not thereon, cannot reſt within your ſmel, and "your ſmell ſo rancke, that you tracke them out at "pleaſure. Whileſt the Cardinall was ſpeaking, the Earle chafed and changed colour & at laſt brake out, and interrupted him thus.

At these girds the Lord Chancellor much fretted, and finding Kildare to bee no babe, deferred the hearing of his cause, till more proofes were produced from Ireland; then in a great fume hee arose from the Councell board, and committed the Earle vnto prison, against the minds of most at the Table, who knew well, that this his accusation was more of hatred borne by the Cardinall, then any occasion giuen by the accused late Deputy. Whereupon Thomas Duke of Norfolke stept to the King, and craued that Kildare might bee his prisoner, offering to bee bound in goods and body for his forth coming, whom hee obtained, though with no great liking of the L. Chancellor, who daily entertaind new plaints against him, till at last hee pressed him sore with letters sent to Oneale and Oconor, to encourage their rebellions against Osorie the Lord Deputy; which letters were brought them by his own daughter and their sisters, the Lady Elice Fitzgirald wife to the Baron of Slane.

(59) This presumption being vehement, the King suspitious, the Cardinall eager, and his friends faint, Kildare was sent to the Tower, where he committed himselfe to God, and expected dayly his death, but with such couragious resolution, as hee being in play with the Lieutenant at slide-groat, when the mandate was brought for his execution on the next morning, and seeing the Lieutenant strucke into a suddaine sadnesse; by Saint Bride, Lieutenant (quoth the Earle) there is some madde game in that scrowll; but fall how it will, this throw is for a huddle: and when the worst was told him, now I pray thee (quoth he) doe no more but learne assuredly from the Kings owne mouth, whether his Highnesse be witting thereto or no; the Lieutenant louing his prisoner well, repaired to the King, and shewed him the Cardinals warrant, who then controuled the sawcines of the Priest (for those were his tearmes) and gaue the Lieutenant his Signet for a countermand, whereat the Cardinall stormed, but Kildare deliuered from his eminent death, and not long after from his imprisonment also, was sent into Ireland, where at his entrance into Dublin, he was met with a solemne procession, and so brought into the City; so welbeloued was this Earle abroad, and at home,

(60) But the French Kings fortunes were nothing so good, who was straitly imprisoned at Madrill in Spaine, and great suite made for his deliuerance, which notwithstanding would not be heard. The Queene mother then Regent of France, wise of her selfe, and forwarded by others, saw no better means to free her sonne the King, then to enter amity with England, which to accomplish, she solicited King Henry; working vpon the occasions then ministred, which was some vnkindnesse growne betwixt the English King, and the Emperour, the one of them more strange by the greatnesse of his fortunes, and the other in iealousie of lessening renowne. The sparkes of which Cinders were steared to flame, by Wolsey that euer was in the eare of the King: alleadging his potency, so much esteemed of all Christian Princes (a sound very tunable in Henries wide eare) would bee lesse regarded by the Emperours late victory; who now beganne to carry himselfe with another respect, and neuer after that victory gotten subscribed his letters to King Henry, according to his accustomed manner, your Sonne and Cosen; but to the draught of his Secretaries, infixed his hand with the word Charles and no more.

(61) These dislikes and other intercourses of State, drew Henry shortly to a peace with France. In the exemplification of which league the Venetians, and other Princes were left to their choise, whereof himselfe notwithstanding would bee stiled the Protector. And to his leaguer Ambassadors sent these instructions to moue the States to consider the Emperours aspired greatnesse, who now commanded the Kingdomes of Naples, and Sicilie; the Dutchie of Millan, the Seigniorie of Ioan, the Countie of Asti, and other possessions in Italie, the whole Country of Germany, being the greatest part of Christendome, already either totally in his possession, or facilly might bee at his command, hauing likewise the lower parts thereof, as the Countries of Artoys, Flanders, Zeland, Holland, Brabant, Henault and others; from the which also a direct passage lay vnto the Dutchie of Burgonie, Auernie and Burbon, besides the Realmes of Castile, Arragon, Granate, Galice, Asturia, Perpynyon, Russinian, and other parts of Spaine; whereupon hee with some other Princes complained, and sought the French Kings deliuerance, which when it was gotten, King Frances acknowledged Henry next vnder God to bee the onely meanes: * but was so slacke in performance of Couenants, that when the Emperour sent to haue them accomplished, he with vnpriucely termes returned the answere, with challenge of combate, which when the Emperour had accepted, hee shrunke backe, and made meanes of a league.

* Sleidan. com. l. 6

(62) But howsoeuer the vnconstancy of our king Henry hath beene blanched forth for not holding himselfe in his leagues or couenants of amity with other Princes; yet the cause being so as some haue obserued, there were occasions giuen aswell as oportunity taken: for Charles the Emperour contrary to couenant receiued Grancetor a tatterous rebell condemned by Parliament, whom hee refused to deliuer, though the King made earnest suit for the man. Moreouer by his Ambassadors in a Treaty of perpetuall peace; holden at Windsor Castell, the nineteenth of Iune, and foureteenth of King Henries raigne; it was concluded that Charles the Emperour should contract the young Princesse the Lady Mary, and take her to his wife, when shee came to able yeeres, which (as Holinshed saith) himselfe sought, at his being in England, promising to remaine vnmarried, till that Princesse had past her Minority, and againe before the battell of Pauia (she now growne vnto sixe yeeres of age) sent his Ambassadors to haue her stiled Empresse, and to bee made Gouernesse of the low Countries; all this notwithstanding after that victory against the French King, hee beganne to recall, and to make small account of that match, pretending the desire of his subiects to haue an heire of his body, which for long time hee could not by Lady Mary; but rather as the English iudged, the cause was the money receiued in loane from King Henry, whereby (as hee thought) the greatest part of her portion was already paid; and the Emperours wants being great, * Isabel the sister of Portingall was much affected: with whom plenty of gold was expected, and great liberality offered by the Emperials in desire to haue an Empresse of their owne Nation.

(63) Besides, against this marriage with Mary, his Counsell of Spaine also excepted, alleadging her to bee begot of his brothers wife, whereby her legitimation might bee called in question, as also the issue of her body, which they in their wisdom thought meet to preuent; these no doubt were the causes that the negotiation of these two Potentates grew daily more desperate. And for his falling off from the French King, these occasions may well bee alleadged.

Lady Maries legitimation called in question.

(64) That whereas it had beene couenanted at the marriage of Lady Mary vnto King Lewis departed this life, one hundred thousand Crowns should bee paid to King Henry, and thirty two thousand Crownes yeerely for her Dowry, during terme of life; both which notwithstanding were retained and kept backe vnpaid. 2. That the said French King had listned vnto Cardinall Poole, who was sent to him from the Pope to stirre warres against England. 3. That contrary to his Couenant hee had entred alliance with the house of Medicis, and had married his daughter Magdalen vnto Iames the fift King of Scotland, then an hostile enemy vnto King Henry. 4. That hee had made suit to match his second sonne Henry Duke of Orleance, with Lady Mary, the onely then Heire apparant of England, which when it came to conclusion, was put in suspence by Anthonie Vescie one of his French Commissioners, who then made doubt whether the marriage of her mother being wife to the Kings owne brother, could bee dispensed with, or the Children begot in this second bed legitimate, or by law allowed to succeed in the throne.

Obiection of French for Lady Maries legitimation.

(65) These considerations no doubt drew the King to bee vnconstant to them that were vnconstant in themselues, and the question of Lady Maries legitimation serued such doubts in his melting conscience, as neuer after could be made sollid: whereof Doctor Longland his Confessor, is said to bee the first man which told the King that his marriage was vnlawfull, vnto whose opinion other great Clerkes did likewise consent; whereupon a rumor ran that the King would be diuorced from the Queene, and the occasion thereof altogether cast vpon the Cardinall of Yorke, in displeasure taken against the Emperour, vnto whome hee had beene suiter for the Archbishopricke of Toledo; whereof failing, hee reuenged his spleene vpon his innocent Aunt Queene Katherine, in mouing the King to cast her off, and to become Suiter vnto the Dutchesse of Alenzon, sister vnto the French King; these rumors King Henry himselfe forbad; but with no better successe then was the report of Queene Annes death, the wife of the Vsurper; both euents following before the mouthes of those relaters could be stopped; vnto which lamentable accident my penne must now enter.

King Henrie marriage of in question.

(67) This match made by king Henry the seuenth, and Ferdinando of Spaine their parents, Prince Henry hauing then attained but to tenne yeeres of age, when he came to foureteene, proscribed against it, as by a deed vnder his own hand, I haue here inserted, the tenor thereof faithfully translated out of Latine, is thus as followeth.

In the name of God, Amen. In the presence of you reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, Lord Richard by the grace of God, and See Apostolike, Bishoppe of Winchester. I Henry Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester doe say, affirme, and by these Writings declare; That although in the time of my Minority, and when I was vnder yeares of marriage, I absolutely contracted matrimony with the most vertuous Lady Katherine, daughter of the King of Spaine, and although also the saide Contract by reason of my being vnder age, doth now appeare of it selfe insufficient, weake, and of no force, vigour, or efficacie: yet forasmuch as that now I am come to perfect yeeres, and that thereby the said Contract may peraduenture bee thought & seeme, by silent consent, mutuall abode in one house, by giuing and receiuing gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatsoeuer, to bee apparantly sufficient, and confirmed: Therefore I Henry Prince of Wales doe here protest, and make knowne to all men that I intend not to approue, ratifie, or confirme in any sort this pretended contract by any thing that I haue said or shall say, haue done, or shall doe: but do at this present renounce the same, freely, and of mine owne accord, vnconstrained either by force, fraude, entreaty, or any way else: and I deny it, and wholy purpose and intend, quite to relinquish this pretended contract of Matrimony by the best wayes and meanes that by law more fully, effectually, and sufficiently I may or shall bee able to doe: and expresly doe disauow the same, according as by these presents I doe disclaime it, and disauow it; and I protest that I nei-

Prince Henry disclaimed the contract.

I neither will nor intend to consent vnto the said Contract, or vnto the said Lady Katherine as my espousall and wife, by any word, deede, act, or gesture to be spoken, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomsoeuer, whensoeuer, or howsoeuer for the time to come. In witnesse whereof I desire, require, entreate, and adiure you all to giue testimonie heereunto.

By me Henry Prince of Wales.

The aboue written Protestation was read and made by the aforesaid Noble Prince Lord Henrie, in the presence of the reuerend Father and Lord in Christ, the Lord Richard by diuine permission Bishop of Winchester, sitting iudiciously in his Court; and I the Notary vnderwritten, at that time present, the writer of his Acts in this behalfe appointed, and in the presence of the vnder-named witnesses: in the yeare of our Lord God, 1505. the eight Indiction of the most holy See, of our father and Lord in Christ, by diuine prouidence Pope Iulius the second, in his second yeere, and 27. of the moneth of Iune, in which day the saide worthy Prince was of perfect yeeres of marriage, as then he did there affirme: in a certaine outward Court within the royall Palace of Richmond, situate in the West-part of the said Palace: Concerning all and singular which things, the aforesaid most noble Prince instantly required and entreated me the aforesaid Notarie to frame an instrument, and likewise the witnesses vnderwritten to giue testimonie. In iustification of all and singular the premisses, the aforesaid Noble Prince hath superscribed his name; and the witnesses as aforesaid entreated and required haue subscribed their names, with their owne hands.

So it is as aboue said which I Iohn Read doe witnesse by my hand and Seale.

The second protestation when he came to yeeres of marriage.

Notwithstanding this prescription foure yeeres after, and the first of his raigne, hee tooke the said Lady Katherine to wife; and without all exception enioied her nuptial society the space almost of twenty yeeres; in which time shee had borne him two sonnes, both of them in their infancy taken away by death, and one daughter Lady Mary growne now vnto tenne yeeres of age. But the scruple of Conscience increasing more tender in the Kings breast, he first refused the Queenes bed; and then mouing the doubt vnto his owne Diuines, sent for the opinions of the most Vniuersities in Europe, as to Paris, Orleance, Bononie, Burges, Anion, Padua, Tolouz, Vincentia, Vauia, Foro, Iuly, and others, which howsoeuer they then stood for the Pope, and hee allowing (by his Predecessors dispensation whose doing could not erre) the Matrimonie lawfull, yet these Academickes concluded against it, and signified the contrarie vnder most of their common Seales as the relation of the Kings Agent imploied vpon the same purpose for that of Padua doth import, which writing vnder his owne hand I haue seene, and heere wil insert his words, as followeth.

Pleaseth it your Highnesse to bee aduertised, that as this day I obtained the Common Seale of the vniuersity of Padua in substantiall and good forme; for all the Doctors were assembled vpon Sunday, and the case was amongst them solemnly and earnestly disputed all Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, and this present Friday in the morning. And thereupon they concluded with your Highnesse, and desired a Notary to set his signe and hand vnto an instrument by Leonicus and Symeoncus deuised in Corroboration of your cause, and thereby to testifie that this instrument was their deed, deuise, act and conclusion. And more credence to be giuen to the said instrument they caused the Chancellor of the Potestate here to set his hand and seale for the approbation of the Authority of the Notary: A Coppy of all the which things I send vnto your Highnesse by this Bearer, in most humble wise beseeching the same to be aduertised that the Generall of the Blacke Friers hath giuen commandement that no Blackefrier dispute the Popes Power: Notwithstanding Prior Thomas Omnibonus procureth daily new superscriptions, and will doe till the briefe of contrary commandement shall come vnto his hands. My fidelity bindeth me to aduertise your Highnesse that all Lutherans bee vtterly against your Highnesse in this cause, and hath letted as much with their wretched poore malice without reason or authority, as they could and might, as well heere as in Padua and Ferrara, where bee no small company of them: I doubt not but all Christian Vniuersities if they bee well handled, will earnestly conclude with your Highnesse. And to obtaine their assent as well through Italie, France, Almaine, Austrich, Hungary and Scotland, I think it maruellous expedient for the preferment of this your most honourable and high cause.

The decree of the Lawiers in the Vniuersity of Paris.

We the Deane and Colledge of the Vniuersity of Paris, after many disputations and reasons, made vpon both sides, turning and searching of Bookes, both by the Law of God, the Popes Law and the Ciuill Law, we say, that the Pope hath no Power to dispense in this case of Matrimony. Yeouen vnder the Seale of their faculty at Saint Iohn Lateranense in Paris, May 2. 1530.

The Iudgement of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Paris.

The Deane and the faculty of holy Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Paris to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wisheth safety in Christ; For the Question proposed we came together in the Church of Saint Martin, and there for the same cause had a solemne Masse of the Holy Ghost, and vpon our oathes determine, that the foresaid Marriage with the Brothers wife departing without children is so forbid by the Lawes of God and Nature, that the Pope hath no power to dispence with such Marriages, whether they be contract or to be contracted; to which this our assertion we haue caused the Seale of our faculty, with our Notaries signe to be put to this present writing. Dated in our Generall Congregation. July 2. Anno 1530.

The determination of the Ciuilians of the Vniuersity of Aniou.

After wee the Doctors and Rector had discussed and examined many places aswell of the Law of God as of mans Law, vpon sufficient deliberation taken, wee define and determine, that neither by the Law of God nor of Nature, it is permitted for any Christian man, no not with the authority of the See Apostolike, or with any dispensation granted by the Pope to marry the wife that his brother hath left. In witnesse whereof wee haue commanded the Scribe of our Vniuersity to signe this present publike instrument with the great Seale of our said Vniuersity.

Enacted in the Church of Saint Peter in Anion. May 7. Anno 1530.

The Determination of the Vniuersity of Burges.

We the Deane and facultie of Diuinity, in the Vniuersity of Burges, after the example of Saint Paul the Doctor of the Gentiles, begin with prayer to the quieting of the conscience, to whom this our writing shall come; the Question moued is whether the brother taking the wife of his dead brother, the marriage consummated, and perfect, be a thing lawfull or no. We by much labour and turning of Bookes, euery one of vs a part by himselfe, free from corruption, the better to obey the truth, finde it forbidden by the Leuiticall law which is Gods, and that such marriage is an abhominable discouering of his brothers shame, which cannot be allowed by the authority of any man: which our determination we haue caused to be signed with the seale of our faculty, the tenth day of Iune, and yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The opinions of the Diuines in the Vniuersity of Bonony.

All wee Doctors of Diuinity in this Vniuersity, vnto whom this Question was propounded, whether it was forbidden only by the Ordinance of the Church, or else by the Law of God, that a man might not marry the left wife of his brother departed without children, and hauing examined the matter euery one of vs alone, lastly came altogether, and as it were line by line, and rule by rule, brought forth the reasons for the contrary part, with those of the most Reuerend Father Cardinall Caietaine, yea and of the dispensation for raising vp seed to his brother, spoken of in Deuteronomie; thus we determine, giue iudgement, and say, and confidently doe hold and witnes that such marriage is horrible, accursed, and to be cried out vppon, and vtterly abhominable, not only for a Christian man, but for an Infidel vnfaithfull or heathen: and that it is prohibited vnder greeuous paines and punishments by the Law of God, of Nature, and of man, and that the Pope, though he may doe much, vnto whom Christ gaue the keies of the Kingdome of Heauen, hath no power to a dispensation to anie man to contract such marriage: In witnes whereof we confirme this our iudgement, both vnder the Seale of our Vniuersity, as also with the Seale of our Colledge of Doctors of Diuinity, and haue subscribed it in the Cathedrall Church of Bonony this tenth of Iune, the yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Padua.

Seeing that certaine great Orators and Ambassadors did humbly require of vs, that wee would vouchsafe to search out with all diligence this question following, whether to marry the wife of our brother departed without children is forbidden onely by the Law of the Church, or by the Law of God also: and if forbid by both the Lawes, whether the Pope may dispence with any man for such Matrimony or no? which Question we haue discussed and as farre as we can, haue made it cleere, both priuate euery man by himselfe and after al together openly; we say, iudge, decree, witnesse, and for truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage: yea and that it is abhorred and cursed of euery Christian man, and to be abominate as a greeuous sinne, and that it is cleerely forbidden vnder cruell penalty by the Lawes of nature, of God, and of man, and that the Pope vnto whom the keies of the Kingdome of Heauen are committed by Christ the Sonne of God hath no power to dispense by the right of Law for any cause, suggestion, or excuse, that any such Matrimony should be contracted. In witnesse whereof wee haue made this writing, and haue authorized it, with the accustomed Seale of our Vniuersity, dated at Padua in the Church of the Heremites of Saint Augustine the first of Iuly, and yeere of our Lord. 1530.

The determination of the Vniuersity of Tholouze.

It was treated in our Vniuersity of Tholouze: whether it were lawfull for a brother to marry her which had beene wife to his brother now departed, and without children: as also whether the Pope which hath the cure of Christs flocke allowing it by his dispensation, it be lawful: to resolue which, the best Doctors of Diuinity, and the Laws, did sweare that they would obey the sacred Counsels, and would follow the holy Decrees of the Fathers, and falling to conclusion stucke fast vpon this point, that it is lawfull for no man, neither by the Law of God, nor by the Law of nature, to take her to wife that his brother hath left: neither can the Pope dispence with this law of God: as touching the commandement in Deuteronomy that the brother should marry his wife to raise vp seede vnto him, that his name should not perish among the Tribes of Israel, we answere that that Law was but a shadow and figure of things to come, which vanished away as soon as the substance of the Gospell appeared. Thus haue we giuen our sentence, which wee haue signed with our Authenticall Seale of this Vniuersity. Teouen at Tholouze, the Calends or first day of October, the yeere of our Lord, 1530.

These and many more were read by the Lord Chauncellor vnto the lower house of Parliament that they might report in their countries, the Kings iust cause of diuorse. To forward which (as was thought) Cardinall Wolsey the said Lord Chancellor was sent Ambassadour into France, laden with Crownes, as Guicchardine saith, and with surpassing Pompe as London beheld, who with 900. Horse passed the Bridge toward Doner, and so into France.

But rumors in England still spreading of the good Queens diuorse, about a yeere after, K. Henry to satisfie all, sent for his Nobles, his Councellers, Iudges, and many wise Commoners vnto whom he made a most pithy Oration, shewing them with what "care he had ruled almost twenty yeeres with ho- "nour and victory, which as he said, would shortly "be clouded, if he should die and leaue them a liti- "gious Heire, examples he shewed of the wofull ex- "perience of Lancaster and Yorke, in whose dissenti- "ons the Realme was like to haue beene vtterly de- "stroied: and although (saith he) we haue a daugh- "ter to the great comfort of her mother and me, "yet it is told vs by great Clearkes, our marriage is "not lawful, but that she stands in case of illegitima- "tion; and we both, are said to liue in abomina- "ble Adultery; thinke you (my Lords) that these "words doe not touch my very soule, the perill "whereof we venture, as you doe also your inheri- "tance, for which cause I haue asked counsell of the "greatest Clearkes in Christendome, and haue like- "wise heard the opinion of mine owne. But as tou- "ching the Queene, if it bee iudged by the Law of "God that she is my lawfull wife, there shall be no- "thing more acceptable vnto mee, whose noble "conditions, I assure you, (besides her great "Parentage) is most gentle, louing and obedient, "whereof I haue had a true experience almost these "twenty yeeres: and were I to choose a wife (if the "marriage might stand with Gods Law) my Choise "should be of her, before any other woman in the "world, and if it shall otherwise be prooued, I shall "not onely be most sorrowfull for parting with so "louing a companion, but much more haue occasi- "on to lament my chaunce, and life in so foule a sin; "these then are the sores that torments my minde, "for the sauing of my soule, and for which cause I "haue heere assembled you, that you may declare "to our louing Subiects this our true meaning, and "to stay if it may be the rumors of vnstaied reports: and this being said, he let them to depart, each man bewraying in countenance the affection of his mind, some pitying the King to see him so perplexed, some fauouring the Queene sorrowed her case, and some sighed sighed deepely at this strange speech and sudden alteration.

(68) But the Cardinall of Yorke fearefull to wade too farre alone in these troubled waters, desired the assistance of the learned in the Realme, and thereto got the Kings licence, which with his Legatine authority, commanded many learned men both Diuines & Lawyers, from Oxford and Cambridge, with the presence of many Bishoppes besides. These assembled at London, were shewed the Instruments and Seales of many forraine vniuersities; all of them disabling the marriage, and holding the dispensation (allowing it) vnlawfull: but because that string could not bee touched without sound of reproch to the Pope, as also to cleare the King from calumnious reports; it was thought fittest to send the saide instruments to Rome, whereunto these so appointed set their owne seales, with an humble request to his Holinesse, that an indifferent Iudge might be sent them, to determine this great and strange cause of the King; which was so followed by his Ambassadors in the Popes Court, that Laurence Campeius a Cardinall of great credite and wisdome, from their Consistory was sent into England, vnto whom, wise Wolsey Cardinall of Yorke was ioined in commission, with power to erect a Court, to heare the cause pleaded, & to giue sentence definitiue, as they found the equity of law.

(69) To that end therefore a place was ordained at the Blacke-fryers in London, and the King with the Queene remoued themselues vnto his palace of Bridewell neere adioining, whence ere long they were summoned by Processe personally to appeare in Court, which accordingly they did, hauing seueral seates ordained vnder clothes of estate, mounted somewhat higher then the two Cardinals, the Presidents, vnder whose feet sate the Scribes and other Officers; the Court being framed Consistory-wise, was furnished with Bishoppes, Doctors, Lawyers, and learned Counsellors, in most solemne wise: the Doctors for the King, were Simpson and Bell, and his Proctors Peter and Tregonell: for the Queene were Fisher, Standish, and Ridley, a very little man but a great Diuine, the Court thus set, and Commission read, the Cryer called the King, by the name of King Henry to come into the Court, who forthwith answered and said, Here. Then was the Queene called by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court, who made no answere at all, but presently rose vp, and going about the Court to the King, fell down on her knees, before his feet, and in the hearing of the people spake thus in effect.

"Sir, I desire you to take some pitty vpon mee, "and doe mee Iustice and Right: I am a poore wo- "man, a stranger borne out of your Dominions, "hauing here no indifferent Councell, and lesse as- "surance of friendshippe. Alasse, wherein haue I "offended, or what cause of displeasure haue I gi- "uen, that you intend thus to put mee away? I take "God to my Iudge, I haue beene to you a true and "humble wife, euer conformable to your will and "pleasure, neuer gaine-saying any thing wherein "you tooke delight, without all grudge or discon- "tented countenance; I haue loued all them that lo- "ued you, howsoeuer their affections haue beene "to mee ward, I haue borne you children, and bin "your wife now this twenty yeers, of my virginity "and marriage bed, I make God and your own "conscience the Iudge, and if it otherwise bee pro- "ued, I am content to bee put from you with "shame. The King your Father in his time for wis- "dome was knowne to bee a second Salomon, and "Ferdinando of Spaine my Father, accounted the "wisest among their Kings; could they in this "match bee so farre ouerseene, or are there now "wiser and more learned men, then at that time "were? surely, it seemeth wonderfull to mee that "my marriage after twenty yeeres should bee thus "called in question with new inuention against me "who neuer intended but honesty. Alasse Sir, I "see I am wronged, hauing no Counsell to speake "for me, but such as are your Subiects, and cannot "bee indifferent vpon my part. Therefore I most "humbly beseech you, euen in Charity to stay this "course, vntill I may haue aduise and counsel from "Spaine; if not, your Graces pleasure be done. And thereto withall rising, and making lowly obeysance to the King, departed thence, leaning vpon the Arme of her receiuer, each man expecting shee had returned to her seat, when as shee tooke directlie out of the place; which being perceiued, the Cryer againe called her by the name of Queene Katherine to come into the Court; Madam quoth her guid, you are againe called; on, on, said shee, it maketh no matter, this is no indifferent Court for me; therfore goe forward.

Queene Katherine departed the Court.

(70) The King perceiuing that she was departed, presently spake thus vnto the assembly. "I will "(quoth hee) in her absence declare before you all, "that shee hath beene to mee a most true, obedient "and comfortable wife, endued with all vertuous "qualities and conditions, according to her birth; "and in lowlinesse equals any of baser estate. With that Cardinall Wolsey made vnto the King an humble request, that his Maiesty would bee pleased to declare before that honourable audience, whether hee had beene the causer of this his intended diuorce, wherewith hee was charged in the opinions of the people.

The Kings report of his Queene.

"My Lord Cardinall quoth the King, I can well "excuse you in this, and rather affirme that you "haue beene against mee, in attempting it thus far: "but the chiefest motiue for this matter, was the "scruple of conscience, conceiued vpon certaine "words spoken by the Bishop of Bayon, the French "Ambassador, sent from the King to conclude a "marriage betwixt Prince Henry his second sonne, "Duke of Orleance, and our onely daughter Lady "Mary, which Bishoppe made doubt, and desired "respite to bee satisfied for the legitimation of our "said daughter, in respect of our marriage with this "woman, being my owne brothers wife, which pre- "sently engendred such scruples and doubts in me, "that my conscience hath beene continually vexed, "lest by continuing in that sinne after knowledge, I "draw Gods indignation against me, which I feare "wee haue already done in that hee hath sent vs no "Issue male, and them that were begot in this nup- "tiall bed, no sooner came into the world, but were "taken againe thence, and hopelesse now of more "issue by her, it behoueth me to consider the state "of this Realme, and the danger that may follow "for lacke of a lawfull Prince to succeed. This bur- "den too weighty for my weake conscience (not in "any dislike of the Queenes age, or person, with "whom I desire onely to continue, if our marriage "may stand with the law of God) I haue in this "place assembled you our graue Prelates, and lear- "ned Diuines, to determine of, and will God wil- "ling submit my selfe to your iudgements. My "doubts in this case I moued in confession to you "my Lord of Lincolne, and ghostly father, whereof "your selfe being somwhat trobled, said you would "aske counsell of you all my Lords. Then of you "my Lord of Canterbury being Metropolitane, I got "licence to put the matter in question, to which "grant you all put your seales, as here in this Court "the same is to bee seene. True it is, said the Lord of Canterbury, and I doubt not but that all my bre- thren here present will acknowledge the same. Not so my Lord said the Bishoppe of Rochester, you neuer had my hand to that Instrument, nor neuer shal. Indeed said Canterbury you did it not your selfe, but admitted mee to subscribe your name, and allowed mee your Seale; vnder your correction said Roche- ster that is not so; Well, well, (quoth the King) you are but one man, against whom at this time we will not dispute, and so rose vp, and the Court adiourned vntill another day. Which was vpon the next following, and twenty of May; the two Cardinals being set, the Lawyers were ready vpon either parts. Against the lawfulnesse of the marriage was alleadged the other formerly solemnized with Prince Arthur, the Kings elder brother, and the nuptiall knowledge of Lady Katherines body, which was vehemently prosecuted by the Kings learned Councell, by many reasons and likelihood of truth: one was, that Prince Henry had beene deferred from creation and title of Prince of Wales, the space of sixe monethes after Arthurs decease, as doubtfull whether Lady Katherine had beene by him conceiued with child; for which cause as was alleadged the saide Lady had procured a second Bull from the Pope, with this toleration, vel forsan cognitam, and peraduenture carnally knowne: which Bull was onely purchased to dispence with this marriage. That she was carnally knowne, was vrged the report of his Chamberlaine, vpon certaine wordes spoken by Prince Arthur the first morning that hee rose from her bed.

(71) The Negatiues denied all the presumptions, and this last, too farre vnbeseeming that reuerent assembly and honourable Court. But by these Authenticall Records which M. Fox had in his custody, the matter is past all contradiction for her carnall knowledge, where it is affirmed that the Ambassadors of Ferdinando, being in England to see the same mariage consummated, returned their knowledge of their mutuall coniunction, as that nothing was left vnperformed of any nuptiall right, and they being of yeeres able to explete the Act, hee aboue fifteene, and shee aboue seuenteene, laide both in one bed almost fiue monethes together, doe assure vs the certainety of that, which they made their greatest doubt, vnlesse the Popes dispensation was a Core to the cause. But that shee was carnally knowne the Vniuersity of Padua had concluded in their sentence, whom the Emperors Ambassadors earnestly solicited, either to retract their said grant, or to giue forth a new sentence vpon the case that the Queene was not carnaliter cognita ab illustrissimo Principe Arthuro, or to determine that this Matrimony was not dirimendum, which in no wise they could obtaine though they offered very largely to haue it done. Thus from day to day the pleas proceeded, but nothing concluded touching the diuorce; wherupon the King sent the two Cardinals to perswade with the Queene to put the whole matter onely to himselfe, which would bee farre better, and more honourable for her, then to stand to the tryall of law.

Great presumptions that Qu. Katherine had been carnally known by Prince Arthur.

Ex MS. by the Kings Agent.

The Emperour sought to reuert the sentence of Padua.

The two Cardinals perswade the Queene.

(72) These Legates accordingly repaired to Bridewell, and in presence staied for the Queene, who presently from among her maides at worke came forth vnto them, hauing a skeine of white threade about her necke; at whose sight shee said, alacke my Lords, I am very sorry to make you attend vpon me; what is your will? if it please your Grace (quoth Cardinall Wolsey) to goe into your priuy Chamber, we will deliuer the cause of our comming: my Lord (quoth she) this place is most fit, I pray you therfore declare here your minds. With that hee began his speech in Latine which she presently interrupted, saying, that shee vnderstoode the English very well.

Wolseyes speech to the Queene.

"(73) Madam (quoth the Cardinall) wee are "come in goodwill, to know your Graces mind, in "this great matter of your marriage, and to giue "you our aduise with the best seruice wee can. My "Lords (said shee) I thanke you, but for answere of "my resolution, I cannot so suddenly make, the cause "is great, and toucheth mee very neere; I am here "a stranger, a poore woman lacking witte, not able "to answere such noble and wise personages as yee "be, I haue need of counsell, and they be in Spaine; "for thinke you my Lords, that any English subiects, "will bee for me against the King? forsooth I know

The Queenes answere.

"they wil not, I pray your Lordships be good vnto "me, a forrainer and destitute of friends, and assist "mee with your Counsels, which I will bee glad to "heare. And thereupon taking them by the hands, led them into her Chamber, where they stayed somewhat long; which done they departed, and made relation of her answere vnto the King. Who nothing pleased at the answere shee made them, sent againe certaine Lords vnto her, to shew her the determinations of those Christian Vniuersities, who had prescribed the marriage vnlawfull, and to wish her to remit the matter for the quieting of the kings conscience vnto foure Prelates, and foure temporall Lords: vnto whom shee answered saying, "the King "my Father which concluded my marriage, I am "sure was not so ignorant, but he asked counsell of "Clerkes and well learned men, before hee married "me the second time: for if he had had any doubt in "my marriage, hee would not haue disbursed so "great a treasure as hee did, and then all the Doctors "agreede my marriage to be good; insomuch that "the Pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be "done, did both dispense and ratifie the second mar-"riage, against whose doinges I marualle that a-"ny person will speake or write. But as touching the "determinations of the Vniuersities, I am a woman "and lacke witte and learning to answere to them, "but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whe-"ther they haue done iustly or partially: for this I "am sure, that neither the Kings father, nor my fa-"ther would haue condiscended to our marriage, if it "had beene declared to bee vnlawfull; and where "you say, I should put the cause to eight persons of "this Realme for quietnesse of the Kings conscience; "I pray God send his Grace a quiet conscience: and "this shall bee your answere, that I say I am his "lawfull wife, and to him lawfully married, and by "the order of the holy Church, I was to him espou-"sed as his true wife (although I was so worthy) and "in that point I will abide till the Court of Rome "which was priuy to the beginning, haue made ther-"of a determination and finall end.

(74) The King then hopelesse of his Queenes consent hasted his Lawyers to forward their diuorse, which daily they did, and the Consistory at Blacke-Friers daily frequented, all points in Law were opened to the full, so that nothing now remained but the sentence of the Iudges: for which a solemne day was assigned when the King in person came to heare it himselfe. His seat taken, and the Court set, after a crie for silence the proceedings were openly read, and all doubts cleared, the learned Counsell at Barre called for Iudgement, wherunto Campeius the Popes stoute Champion, vpon his stiffe gouty legges stood vp, all men expecting the sentence of Diuorce, but the Cardinall now not to learne what hee had formerly determined, said flatly, I will not giue iudge-"ment in this matter, too high for vs, considering "the estates of the Persons, and the doubtfulnesse "of the occasions alleaged, vntill I haue made a full "relation to the Popes holinesse of all our procee-"dings, whose counsell and commandement in this "case I will obserue and follow, vnder whose autho-"rity we sit and are commissioners, therefore I will "adiourne the Court for this time according to the "order of the Court of Rome from whence our sem-blable iurisdiction is deriued. Cheſtes ſearched at Calis, euen to the Cloke-bags and Males. The cauſe of this ſtay (ſaith Sleidan) was, that the French King, an entire friend vnto Rome, had no better ſucceſſe in Naples, againſt the Emperour, whom the Pope durſt not diſpleaſe, the Lady Katherine being his Aunt, for whom the Emperour was ſo earneſt, as in her behalfe he laboured Millan and many other places, that their learned men ſhould not determine againſt the ſaid Queene. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, that Campeius denied his ſentence for the Diuorce, certaine it is, that Cardinall Wolſey, fell likewiſe in great diſpleaſure of the King, though hee ſought to excuſe himſelfe with want of ſufficient authority: but now his Sunne hauing paſſed the Meridian of his greatneſſe, began by degrees againe to decline, till laſtly it ſet vnder the cloud of his fatall eclipſe.

(75) Formerly wee haue ſpoken of the riſing of this man, who now being ſwolne ſo bigge by the blaſts of promotion, as the bladder not able to conteine more greatneſſe, ſuddenly burſt, and vented foorth the winde of all former fauours. Vaine glorious he was, in ſtate, in diet, and in rich furniture for houſe, and in prodigall intertainements, more like to a Prince then a Prelate, attended with ſo many officers, and ſeruants as is almoſt incredible, were not his Check-roll yet to bee ſeene. At his maſſe he was ſerued by Dukes, and Earles, who tooke the aſſaie of his wine on their knees, and held him his Baſen at the Lauatorie. And being Ambaſſador vnto the Emperour at Bruxels, was there waited vpon by manie noble men of England, and ſerued at Table by his ſeruitors vpon their knees, to the great admiration of the Germaines which behelde it: and indeed ſo much ouertopped the Pompe of a ſpirituall function, as he ſeemed to the more humble, to be mad for ioy; and him doth Campian iudge, rather to be a Baſtard of ſome Prince, then the ſonne of a Butcher, ſo moulded for the one, and ſo farre mounting from the other: exceedingly wiſe he was and very wel ſpoken, but full of reuenge and vicious of body, thrall to affection, and lulled aſleepe with flattery, inſatiable to get, but princely in beſtowing, lofty to his enemies, and not eaſily reconciled, which haſtened his fall, when he firſt began for to ſlippe. Queene Katherine in her cauſe, did grieuouſly accuſe him, the Counſell for their parts, did article againſt him, the Law found him in a premunire vnto the King, and Sir Thomas Moore in the high Court of Parliament inueighed bitterly againſt him.

(76) The firſt ſteppe of his diſcent was his diſlike of the Kings affection vnto Anne Bullen, a Gentlewoman nothing fauourable to his Pontificall Pompe, nor no great follower of the Rites of thoſe times, which moued the Cardinall (the Pope hauing aſſumed the ſentence of Queene Katherines cauſe vnto himſelfe) to write vnto his holineſſe to deferre the iudgement of Diuorce, till he had wrought the Kings minde in another mould. This was not done ſo ſecretly, but that it came to the Kings eare, and laſtly coſt the proud Cardinall his life. For the broad Seale firſt taken from him, and his other Biſhopricks elſewhere beſtowed, his Houſe and furniture ſeazed vpon, and himſelfe remoued into the North, at Cawood Caſtle ſeuen miles from Yorke, was ſuddenly arreſted (for arrogant words importing a deſire of reuengement, ſaith Sleidan) by the Earle of Northumberland, whence he was conueied toward London by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in which iourney at Leiceſter Abbey he ended his life, whoſe death himſelfe had haſtened by taking an ouermuch quantity of a confection to breake winde from off his ſtomacke, and in that Church was there enterred.

(77) The grudges againſt this Cardinall were many and great, not onely for the eſpeciall fauour he ſtood in with the King, and great ſtroake he bare at Counſell Board, (both which commonly breede emulation vnto the man ſo eſtated) but for his intollerable pillings, who to patch vp his pride in the raiſing of his new Colledges, erected at Oxford and Ipſwich, by the licence of Pope Clement 7. ſuppreſſed fortie Monaſteries of good fame, and bountifull Hoſpitalitie, conuerting all their goods and moueables into his owne Cofers; which were ſo ſtuffed with treaſure; that twelue Barrels full of gold and ſiluer were laid aſide, to ſerue the Pope in his warres. As alſo that he emptied the Land of twelue ſcore thouſand pound, enforced by him from the King. All which he conuerted to relieue, and ranſome the Pope then in Priſon, to the great impoueriſhing of his Maieſties Cofers. That his owne reuenewes by his faculties, licences, and other legantine exactions did equalize the Kings yeerely Reuenewes, and laſtly his pride ſo intolerable, as no leſſe then twelue hundred horſe for his retinue, foureſcore Wagons for his carriage, and threeſcore Mules for ſumpter horſes attended him into France. But ſic tranſit gloria mundi, and the higheſt floud is ſubiect to an ebbe.

(78) But whilſt the matter of the Kings marriage hung thus in ſuſpence the ſpace of two yeeres, and other Ambaſſadors intended to bee ſent vnto Rome: it chaunced Doctor Cranmer, Doctor Stephens, and Doctor Fox to meet at Waltham at one Table, where the two later, great Agents for the King, fell in diſcourſe of his cauſe by termes, and ſtrength of the Ciuill Law. Well ſaid Doctor Cranmer, if I might be heard, I thinke much better it might be tried by Gods Law: whereby the King ſhould bee ſurer ſetled in the cauſe of his Conſcience, then thus to be poſted off with delaies from yeere to yeere. This ſpeach Doctor Fox made known to his Maieſtie, which ſounded very tunably in his eare, then was Cranmer ſent for, conferred with by the King, and commanded to write his minde in the matter, but with this caution prefixed, not to reſpect the perſons but the cauſe; who to him commended the vertuous perfections of his Queene, with whom aboue all others he moſt deſired to continue, if their marriage could bee made warrantable by Gods Lawes: to which end he commended the care of Bookes, and of his other Prouiſions vnto the Earle of Wiltſhire at Durham Place. The Doctor thus ſet on worke, when he leaſt looked to be ſo imploied, proued by Scriptures, General Councels, Auncient Writers, beſides the preſent, and his owne opinion, that the Biſhop of Rome had no authority to diſpence with the word of God, nor the Scriptures.

(79) The treatiſe thus finiſhed, he preſented it to the King, which when he had well read, and weighed the ſubſtance therein conteined; Will you (quoth he) Maſter Doctor abide by what you haue writ? that will I by Gods grace ſaid Cranmer, euen before the Pope himſelfe, if your Maieſty will ſo aſſigne it; Marry quoth the King to him ſhall you goe. Whereupon Thomas Bullen Earle of Wiltſhire, Doctor Stokeſley, Elect of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, the Doctors Crane, Bennet, and Cranmer, were ſent to the Pope then at Bononie in Italy. The day approached for audience of their Ambaſſage, and the high Prelate ſet vpon his Throne of Eſtate, the Doctor prepared to make his Oration in defence of what he had writ, when on the ſuddaine he was interrupted by an vnmannerly ſpaniell of the Earles, who ſeeing the Pope put forth his foot to be kiſt, caught in his teeth the Pontificals great Toe, ſo that theſe Ambaſſadors diſdaining to kiſſe where the dogge had taken an aſſay, let the Pope draw backe his foote, and ſo loſt that eſpeciall fauour offered vnto them. The Propoſition then made, that no man iure diuino could or ought to marry his brothers wife, and that the Biſhop of Rome by no meanes could diſpence to the contrary, was replied vnto, that it ſhould be anſwered at more leaſure, when his holineſſe returned to Rome; in the meane while, to grace Cranmer the more, he gratified him with the office of the Penitenciariſhip, and ſo diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors: who all, ſauing Cranmer returned ned to England; but he tooke his way towards the Emperour (to whom the cause somewhat appertained) being then at Vienna in his expedition against the Turke, vnto whose learned men he offered disputation, and in priuate conference so satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most respected for learning in the Emperours Court, as he held the Proposition most true. Whereupon others learned were discouraged to dispute, and suffered Cranmer to depart without any further proceedings.

(80) The matter thus manifested in most parts of Christendome, this Gordians knot was lastly vnlooſed by King Henrie himselfe, who now besides this his marriage, beganne to call in question, what authority the Pope had in his dominions, which being afterwards debated in Parliament, an Act passed against his vsurped Hierarchy, and all persons forbidden to appeale, or to make any paiments vnto Rome. The Kings marriage with Lady Katherine, was by the same Parliament dissolued, and his separation from her, made by the Archbishop of Canterburie to stand good, and effectuall by Law, and that Queene Katherine from thenceforth should be called Princesse Dowager, which doings shee tooke so to hart, as shee procured the Popes curse against King Henrie, and his Realme, which curse was set vp at Dunkirke in Flaunders, for that the bringer thereof durst come no neerer. And the Pope in reuenge of himselfe, being set in his Consistory accompanied with his Cardinals, proceeded to the Censure of these great Princes marriage, which he then adiudged to stand most firme and Canonicall, and enioyned King Henry to hold matrimoniall society with the said Katherine his lawfull wife and Queene, and in that estate to account and maintaine her as it became a King and louing husband to doe, and if he refused to accomplish these premisses, then to be compelled thereunto, and neuer after to be heard in any Court as touching the inualiditie of the said marriage, and to pay the expences of the said trauerse, as he the holy father should limit and thinke meete. This was done a yeere after that the King had married Queen Anne, and bare date from Rome, the 23. of March and yeere of Christ 1534. For in the meane while King Henry had set his affection vpon the Lady Anne Bullen, a Phenix indeed in his Princely eye, and another Hester for Englands saluation, both in her selfe and roiall Bud succeeding, as the heauens and world doe witnes to this day. Shee was the daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Viscount Rochford, Earle of Wiltshire, and of Ladie Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke. This Earle Thomas her father was the sonne of Sir William Bullen, whose wife was Lady Margaret, the second daughter and Coheire of Thomas Butler Earle of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the sonne of Sir Godfrey Bullen Lord Maior of London, who lieth buried in Saint Laurence Church in the Iewrie, pictured in his winding sheete vpon a Plate of Brasse, and about his Graue-stone vpon a border of brasse in many places these words are written, Now thus, Now thus, Now thus, whose Charity was extended vpon the poore housholders of that Citie, in distributing among them a thousand pounds. His Lady was Anne, eldest daughter and Coheire vnto Thomas Lord Hoo and Hasting, and his discent out of the house of the Bullens, an ancient Family in the Countie of Norfolke; accursed therefore be the pen, that slanderously bringeth this rose from a defiled Bed, whose Serpents mouth to vphold his God the Pope, hath spewed out his poison of vntruthes, and made his tongue a sharpe sword against the Lords annointed; let him therefore receiue his portion with the Serpent of deceit, and his reward with Satan the father of Lies.

Which his businesse being ended in France, and the King againe returned into England, he presently (though priuily) married the said Lady Marchioneſſe in his Closet at Whitehall, in the presence of many; the Lady Anne Sauage bearing her Traine, and Doctor Lee doing the rites of their coniunction, who was afterwards consecrated Bishop of Chester, Couentree and Lichfield, and President of Wales.

(83) The Romanists much fearing that Babel would downe, if Queene Anne might bee heard against wicked * Haman, sought to vnderproppe the foundations thereof, with certaine deuises of their owne; and that the same might passe without note of suspition, they laid their forgery euen vpon Heauen it selfe; whose pretended Oracle Elizabeth Barton (commonly called, the holy maide of Kent) was made to bee; and the pillers of this godlesse Fabricke were Edward Bocking, a Moncke by profession, and doctor of Diuinity, Richard Masters, Parson of Aldington, the Town wherein she dwelt, Richard Deering a Monke, Hugh Rich a Frier, Iohn Adestone, and Thomas Abell, Priests, put to their helping handes, and Henrie Gould Bachelour of Diuinity, with Iohn Fisher the Reuerend father of Rochester, imploied their paines to daube these downe-falling walles, with their vntempered Morter. The Scribes that set their pens for her Miracles, were Edward Thwaites Gentleman, and Thomas Lawrence Register, besides Haukherst a Monke who writte a letter that was forged to bee sent her from Heauen; and Richard Risby and Thomas Gould, were the men which dispersed her Miracles abroad to the world. This holy maide Elizabeth made a Votarisse in Canterbury, was taught by Bocking her Ghostly Father, and suspected Paramour, to counterfeit many fayned trances, and in the same to vtter many vertuous words for the rebuke of sinne, vnder which, more freely shee was heard against Luthers Doctrine, and the Scriptures translation, then desired of many: neither so onely, but that shee gaue foorth from God, and his Saints, by sundry suggestiue Reuelations, that if the King proceeded in his diuorce, and second marriage, he should not raigne in his Realme one moneth after, nor rest in Gods fauour the space of an houre. But the truth discouered by Gods true Ministers, this Oracle gaue place as all other such did, when Christ by his death stopped their lying mouthes: for her selfe and * seuen of her Disciples were executed for Treason at Tiborne, and the other sixe put to their fines and imprisonment. With the like counterfeit reuelations and fained predictions this Generation of Hypocrites had brought Edward Lord Stafford, Duke of Buckingham vnto his vnhappy ende, when as by the working of Iohn de la Court, his own Confessor, together with Nicolas Hopkins a Monke of the Carthusian Order, in the Priorie of of Henton in Somersetshire, who by his visions from heauen forsooth, heartned him for the Crown; but before his owne Coronet could aspire to that toppe, hee worthily lost both head and all vpon Tower-hill for his treason, Ann. Dom. 1521. Vnto such sinnes the world was then subiect, and into such conceites their reputed holines had brought them, not onely among the simple and vnlettered, but euen with them that seemed to bee learned indeed: for by certaine predictions foreshewing a great deluge, Prior Bolton of Saint Bartholmewes in London was so fearefull, that hee built him a house vpon the height of Harrow hill, storing it with prouisions necessary, to keepe himselfe from drowning, in A. D. 1524.

(84) But the Popes Holinesse fearing the euent of the game, if euery man might set and cast at his Crowne, thought it high time to lay hand on his own State, and to keepe what was left, lest al would bee gone; to which end he sollicited many Christian Princes to stand on his part, and among them sent his Brief vnto Iames the fift king of Scotland, desiring his assistance against King Henry of England, whom in his Consistory hee had pronounced to bee an Heretike, a Schismatike, a manifest Adulterer, a publike murtherer, a committer of Sacrilege, a Rebell, and conuict of Lesæ Maiestatis, for that hee had risen against him who was his Lord. And therefore he had iustly depriued him of his said Kingdom, and would dispose the same to him and other Princes: so as they would assist to recouer the same, a very good prouision, and very well foreseene; for notwithstanding these boisterous blasts from Rome, the King kept his Crowne, and was rather feared of the Popes best Abetters, then did feare any potent power that the world could afford, whose thoughts were now busied for the Coronation of his Queen.

(85) For Queene Anne conceiued, and perceiued with Child, her royall Coronation was forthwith prepared, which with all royall obseruances vpon the first of Iune, being Whitsunday was performed; and the seuenth of September following, shee bare into the world that excellent Princesse, which afterwardes proued the mirrour of the world, euen Lady ELIZABETH, our late and most famous Queene.

(86) True it is, that the zealous conuersation of this godly Queene gaue great encouragements vnto many, more publikely with boldnes to professe the Gospell; so that the Ministers formerly fled in case of Religion, returned againe into England, where the new Testament (translated by Tyndall) was read, but with such dislikes to the Bishoppes, that they got it to be burnt. Notwithstanding, to tickle the Kings eare, they preached against the Popes supremacy, and tooke the oath for the King themselues; abolished his authority by Act of Parliament, and suppressed many Monasteries; leauing their reuenewes to the Kings will; faire introductions indeed for what they intended, as the sequell of the sixe Articles by them procured, doth manifestly shew: and those purposely made against the maintainers of the Gospell, whereof Queen Anne was the chiefe, who first was most fauourable to those learned Diuines, that laide mans saluation vpon the Rocke Christ, next in procuring a tolleration from the king for them, whose doctrine did daily vndermine the Papall foundation: & lastly, she by no means would consent to marry the King, vntill a lawfull diuorce was had for his separation from Lady Katherine, his brother Arthurs wife, which thing this Pope greatly withstood: these were causes sufficient to moue his Holinesse to bend his brow, and by his Instruments in Court to cutte off the principal mouer, who foreslowing no time tooke the Ball before his rebound.

(87) For the Queene deliuered of a dead Child, and the Kings affection wandring elsewhere, gaue them occasion to worke on that Subiect, which God in his wisdome would haue downe, lest his deliuerance from the bondage of darkenesse should be attributed to any fleshly arme, or that shee who then sate in the throne of the worlds full felicity, should fixe her senses on so fickle a Center, who hauing had experience what it was to bee a Prince, must henceforth practise the patience of a poore prisoner, which in the third yeere of her marriage, and second of May, to act the wofull Scene of her Tragedy, shee came vpon the Stage, being sent to the Tower of London, and charged with high Treason against the King: at whose first entrance shee fell on her knees before Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolke; and Thomas Cromwell Secretary her bringers, desiring God so to helpe her as she was guiltlesse of those things whereof shee was accused, beseeching those Lords to bee Petitioners vnto his Maiesty in her behalfe, who lamenting her case, left her Prisoner with Sir William Kingston Constable of the place.

(88) I will in no wise excuse her guilt, hauing had iudgement and death by law, though others, and that vpon iust occasions before mee haue done, but will speake from them what they haue said; and namely one, that wrote thereof vnto a worthy and reuerent person; in whose defence his wordes are these: It seemeth very plaine, that the crimes supposed against this Christian Queene Anne, were matters contriued by the deuise of the Pope, and his Instruments her enemies. None of them all that were accused in the same Treason, confessing the Act euen vnto death, but haue left direct Testimonies in writing to the contrary; one meane Groome excepted, namely Marke Smeton, made confession vpon some promise of life belike, but had his head cut off before hee was aware, or had time to recall what he had said. The like did Cromwell the Secretary signifie to the King, after the prisoners had beene throughly examined in the Tower by the Councell, who wrote thus in his letter on the same day; many things haue been obiected, but nothing confessed, onely some circumstances haue been acknowledged by Marke. And so doth Cranmer Archbishoppe of Canterbury in his letter of comfort vnto the King, who sore lamented that such a starre was fallen, if her gilt could bee proued, and willed his Highnesse to stand in defence of the Gospell as shee had done, without any report of confessing or acknowledging any such Acts as were obiected, which as Sleidon writeth, were Adultery, and incest, but vniustly (saith he) as it is supposed and proued since: With her were executed certaine Gentlemen of the Kings Priuie Chamber, namely, Norris, Weston, Brewton, and one Marks, which contrary to his conscience (as it is reported) for hope of preferment subscribed to a bill, whereby hee condemned both himselfe and all the rest.

Queen Anne thought to die guiltlesse.

(92) And albeit Queene Anne in her life time had sinned as Dauid; or by frailety fell, as who sinneth not; yet that it should be so licentious and vnnatural, the quiet of her conscience at her death, did well witnes the contrary, & her innocency so much more apparant, as her Christian modesty, in excusing her Soueraigne, and yeelding obedience to the law howsoeuer Poole and Paulus Iouius from their Cardinals spleenes haue filled their pennes to blott her faire name, whose death notwithstanding was so grieuously taken among the German Protestant Princes, who were minded to haue made K. Henry the head of their league, that thereupon they vtterly brake off, and refused him, onely for the cause and death of this most Christian Queene, whose religion and vertues dayly shewed forth the fruits of her life, both in preferring the best men of gifts vnto the best benefices, and also retaining for her Chapleins them of good fame, whose godly exhortations shee did not onely follow, but would will them freely to tell her what they saw in her amisse. So mercifull shee was to the poore, that shee spent almost her whole reuenew for their reliefe, and in nine moneths space distributed among them to the value of fifteen thousand pounds, intending likewise to bestow a great stocke into the foure quarters of the Realme, to set poore Artificers on worke. Now if the tree bee known by the fruits, as truely it is, then these were her lights that shined before men, and the workes that shewed the fruites of her faith farre from such sinnes, as the sway of those times charged her with.

(93) And by the working of the same faith, her penancy was seene, in her sorrowes conceiued, and thirsting reconciliation vnto them whome shee had any wise offended, as by this worthy example is apparant; when the day before she suffered death, being attended vpon with six Ladies in the Tower, shee tooke the Lady Kingston into her Presence Chamber, and there locking the dore vpon them, willed her to sit downe in the chaire of Estate: whereunto she answered, that it was her duty to stand, and not to sit at all in her presence, much lesse vpon the seat and state of her, her Queene. Ah Madam quoth shee, that title is gone, I am a condemned person, and by law haue no estate left me in this life; but for clearing of my conscience I pray you sit down; well said the Lady Kingston, I haue often plaide the foole in my youth, and to fulfill your command, I will doe it once more in mine age, and thereupon sate downe vnder the cloth of estate; which no sooner was done, but that the Queene most humbly fell vpon her knees before her, and with teares, holding vp her hands, charged her in the presence of God and his Angels, as she would answere her before them, when all should appeare in iudgement, that shee should so fall downe before the Lady Maries Grace her daughter in Law; and in her name in like manner, aske her forgiuenesse for the wrongs shee had done her, for till that was accomplished (she said) her conscience could not bee quiet: what her offence was to her ward, wee know not, but may be supposed not to bee capitall, the Queenes case wayed, the time considered, and her enemies none of the meanest, onely this I obserue, that as shee cleared her conscience of the lesser crimes, so vndoubtedly would she haue done of the greater, if any had been committed, and so as herselfe instantly desired, I count her case to be charitably spoken of, and leaue her and them vnto the Lord.

The example of Queene Annes penancie.

(94) But as one pillar for the Gospels defence was fallen by the death of Queene Anne, so another was raised, by raising Cromwell from the base of his birth, no better indeed then a Blacke-smithes son, who seruing great Wolsey in the office of his Solicitor, was employed by him for the suppression of forty Monasteries, to the erection of his Colledges at * Oxford and Ipswich, by which he mounted those steps of estate, which set (but not kept) him in the high Chaire of his authority; first by King Henrie hee was made Master of his Iewell-house, then Baron of Okeham in Rutlandshire, then Knight of the Garter, ere long was created Earle of Essex, then was hee made Lord great Chamberlaine, and lastly ordained the Kings Vicar Generall; and thus farre fortune brought him from the forge for a fall.

(95) For King Henry vnstaied in religious resolution (the Supremacy setled where hee would haue it, and the Reuenewes of all Monasteries giuen him by Parliament) sought no further to reforme the Churches abuses, but onely gaue way that the Lords Prayer, the Creede, and Commandements might be read in English, which Cromwell procured to be enacted by Parliament. The Commons then misliking that their mumblings must downe, and the Monkes sore troubled to mingle English in their Masses, the Lincolnshire men beganne a Commotion vnder the conduct of D. Mackarell a Monke, who named himselfe Captaine Cobler, and his followers were growne well neere vnto twenty thousand. Against these, the King in person prepared, sending forth his command vnto seuerall Counties, to charge them with a taxation of furnished Souldiers to meet him at Amphell, as by * one we haue seen signed with the stampe of his hand, and sent vnto the Bishoppe of Exceter for foure hundred able men, whereof sixescore to be Archers, which great preparation being knowne to the Rebels, they sent to his Maiesty these Articles subscribed with many of their hands, the tenour whereof out of the Originall it selfe was as followeth.

Statut. in An. H. 8. c. 13

The Lords Prayer, the Creed, and Commandements in the English tongue.

Commotion in Lincolnshire.

* King Henry letter dated at Windsor 8. of October, and of his raigne.

To the King our Soueraigne Lord.

The aggreuances of the Commons of Lincolnshire.

Pleaseth it your Highnes to be aduertised, that your poore Comminalty, true and faithfull Subiects, in your County of Lincolne, at this present time assembled, findeth our selues grieued in these Articles hereafter following.

Suppression of Monasteries.

First, for the suppression of so many religious houses, as be at this instant time suppressed. Whereby the seruice of God is not onely minished, but also the poorealty of your Realme bee vnrelieued, and many persons bee put from their liuings, and left at large, which we thinke is a great hinderance to the Common-wealth.

Act of Vses.

The second Article is, that wee humblie beseech your Grace, that the Act of vses may bee repealed, because we thinke that by the said Act we be clearely restrained of our liberties, in the declaration of our Willes, concerning our lands: aswell for the payment of our debts, for doing of your Grace seruice, as for helping and releeuing of our children, which wee haue had by the ſufferance of your lawes by a long continuance, which as we thinke is great hurt and diſcommodity to the Common-wealth.

The third Article is, that where your Grace hath a taxe, or quindecim granted vnto you by Act of Parliament, payable the next yeere: which is, and euer hath been leueable of ſchepe and catall: And the ſchepe and catall of your Subiects within this ſaide Shire, are now at this inſtant vtterly decayed and gone. Whereby yff your Grace will take the ſaide taxe, Your ſaid Subiects ſhould be conſtrained to pay iiij.d. for a beaſt, and xii.d. for xx. ſchepe: And that would bee an importunate charge to theym, conſidered the pouerty that they bee in already, and the loſſe which they haue ſuſtained theſe two yeeres by-paſt.

The fowrt Article is, that wee your trew & faithfull Subiects, thynkes that your Grace takes of your Councell, and very nygh about you, ſuch Perſonages as be of lawe birth, and ſmale reputation, which haue procured the premyſſes, moſt eſpeciall for their ſingler lucre and aduantage: the which wee ſuſpect to bee the Lord Cromwell, & Sir Richard Rich Chancelor of the augmentations.

The fift Article is, your Grace to haue the x^th. and firſt fruits of euery ſpirituall promotion, of the value of xx.l. and aboue. And of all other vnder the ſaid value which doe not keepe reſidence and hoſpitality of their ſaid Benefices.

The ſixt Article is, that wee your true Subiectes find them grieued, that there be diuers Biſhoppes of Yngland, of your Grace late promotion, that haue ſubuertyd the faith of Criſt, as we thinke, which is the Archbyſhoppe of Canterbury, the Byſhoppe of Rocheſter, the Byſhoppe of Saresburie, the Byſhoppe of S. Daueys, and the Biſhoppe of Deuelyn. And in eſpeciall as wee thinke the beginning of all the troble of this Realme, and the gret exactions that hath beene taken of your poore Communalty, haue ryſen by the occaſion of the Biſhoppe of Lincolne: by whoſe officers, and by other of the Lord Cromwels ſeruants, a great rumor & noiſe is riſen, and the commune voce is, that ſuch Iowellys, plate, and other anornaments of our Pariſh Churches, which we occupie in the ſeruice and honour of God, ſhould bee taken from vs and ſpoiled in lyke maner and facion, as the houſys of Religion hath bene. For a reformation of all and ſyngler the aforeſayd abvſes, Wee your poore and trewe ſubiects humble requirys your grace and maieſty, that it might pleaſe your highneſſe to call vnto you the Nobility of this your Realme, to ſee ſuch Order and direction concerning all and ſingler the premiſſes, as may ſtand with honor and ſewerty of your grace, the welthe and proſperity of your Realme, and the contentation of vs your poore Subiects, and other the whole Communalty of this your Realme. Whereby wee ſhall not onely accept your Grace to be the Head and Soueraigne of vs your Subiects, but alſo accept and take your Grace to bee Supreme head of the Church of Yngland, which wee doe knowledge your Grace trewe inheritance and right.

Alſo your ſaide trewe and faithfull ſubiects, with the hole aſſent of all your Communaltie of the ſaid Shire, moſt humble beſechith your gracious Maieſty, to perdon this poore bearer in doing this his meſſage to your Highneſſe, who is your trewe and faithfull ſubiect, and hath taken this meſſage vpon him for the feruent loue that hee hath to your Grace moſt in eſpeciall, and for the ſtaying of your Cominaltie euer ſens this ruffull began, hath bene as gladde with all his diligence to ſtay the commune people for the effuſion of blood, as bee all his powre he might. The King with good words pacified theſe Commons, who laying aſide weapons imbraced their pardons.

(96) But this cloud ſcarſly ouerblowne, another more dangerous aroſe in the North, which threatned ſoarer ſtormes by the Skies ouercaſt: for fortie thouſand Ruſticks aſſembled in Yorkeſhire, furniſhed with Horſe, Armour, Artillery and Abillements for warre, threatned to ſet the ſtay of Eſtate vpon the props of their giddy inuentions. Their pretence was Religion, and defence of holy Church, their Banners painted with the fiue wounds of our Lord, the Challice, the Cake and other like inuentions of Rome, and vpon their ſleeues was writte the name of the Lord: and ſo forward, and ſo feruent were they in their proceedings, that this their attempt muſt be termed the holy Pilgrimage. Neither were the Rurall onely guilty in this rebellion, but others of greater place and degree were aſſociates therein, namely, Edward Lord Archbiſhop of Yorke, and the Lord Thomas Darcy, though both of them conſtrained by the Rebels as the ſaid Archbiſhoppe teſtified vnder his owne hand: but voluntary and moſt forward were the Clergy of thoſe parts, the Lord Lumley, Sir Thomas and Sir William Percyes, Sir Robert Conſtable, Sir Francis Bigot, and Sir Robert Neuill all of them Knights, Iohn Lacy, Richard Beamond and Robert Bowes Eſquires; the Bailiffes of Snaythe of Leeds, Kellam, and of Beuerly. And for Captaine Generall, was Robert Aſke a meane Gentleman, and one Rudſtone his Aſſociate in the Field. Other Commanders they had out of the Common ſort, as Iames Diamond Generall of the Foot, and a poore Fiſherman, ſtiled by himſelfe and others, the Earle of Pouerty. What authority theſe bare, among theſe rude multitude may partly bee perceiued by their Mandates, and Commiſſions, ſent foorth in their names, and ſubſcribed with their owne hands, as from the Originals of ſome of them is heere to be ſeene.

Holy Pilgrimage

Ex MS. in Sir Robert Cottons Library.

Lords, Knights, Maſters, Kinſmen, and Friends, wee perceiue that yee bee informed that this Aſſemble our Pilgrimage, which we by the fauour and mercy of Almightie God intendyth to proceede in, is becauſe the King our Soueraigne Lord hath had much inpoceſſions of vs, wee doubt not but yee doe knowne and remember that to our powers we haue beene alwaies as ready in paiments and ſeruices to his Highneſſe as any his ſubiects: and further to acertaine you of the cauſe of our ſaid aſſemble and pilgrimage is this, That forſomuch that ſuch ſimple and euill diſpoſed perſons being of the Kings Councell, hath not onely incenſed his Grace with many things which bee contrarie to the Faith of God, honour of the Kings Maieſty, and the Common wealth of this Realme: and thereby hath deſtroied, and yet vtterly intendeth to deſtroy the Church of England, and the Miniſters of the ſame, as yee know ſo wel as we: but alſo the ſaid Councel hath robbed & ſpoiled, and further intendyth vtterly to robbe and ſpoile the whole body of the Kings Realme, and that as well all you, as vs, if God of his infinite mercy had not cauſed ſuch as hath taken, and heereafter ſhall take this pilgrimage vpon them to proceede in the ſame: and whether all theſe things be true or not, we put it to your conſcience. And if yee thinke it bee true, and fight againſt vs, which intendeth the Comen wealth of this Realme, and nothing elſe, we truſt ye ſhall haue ſmal ſpeed: For this pilgrimage we haue taken hytt for the preſeruation of Cryſts Churche of this Realme of England, the King our Soueraigne Lord the Nobility, Barony and Comens of the ſame, and to the intent to make petition to the Kings Highneſſe for reformation of that which is amiſſe within this his Realm. And for puniſhment of Hereticks & Subuerters of Lawys; and neither for mony, malice, nor diſpleaſure to any perſon, but ſuch as be not worthy to remaine neere the King our Soueraigne Lords perſon. And further we know if yee ſhould obtaine as we truſt yn God ye ſhal natt, then ye put both vs and you, your heires and ours in bondage for euer; and further yee are ſure of the interdiction of Cryſts curſe, and we clere, and out of the ſame: And yf wee ouercome you, yee ſhall be in our wylls; wherefore for a concluſion, if you wyll not comen with vs for a reformation of the Premiſſes, we certifie you by this our writing that we wyll feyght and dye, both againſt you, and all thoſe that ſhalbe about wards to ſtoppe vs in the ſaid pilgrymage: And God ſhall ſhew his Grace and mercy therein: And then yee yee ſhall be Iudged heereafter to be ſheders of ſome of Cryſtyn blood, and deſtroiers of your tuyn Cryſten. From Robart Aske chiefe Captaine of the Comynalty aſſembled in pilgrimage, For the Barony and Cominalty of the ſame.

By mee Robert Aske yn the name of all the Comynalty and Barony.

Ex MS.

Of ſuch terrour and haughty ſpirit was this Captaine Aske, that when Lancaſter an Herald at Armes, was ſent to declare the Kings meſſage in Pomfret Caſtle (which the Rebels had got by ſurrender from the Lord Darcy) hee ſo bluſtred out his anſwers, that the daunted man excuſing himſelfe to bee but a meſſenger, fell before him on his knees; till the Archbiſhop of Yorke tooke him vp, ſaying, it was not beſeeming the Coate hee wore, to proſtrate to any, but onely to his Soueraigne. Reade likewiſe if you pleaſe this ſtrange Mandate from ſome meane man among them; the falſe ſuggeſtion that they poſſeſſed the ignorant with, and the Oath whereunto theſe holy Pilgrimes were ſworne, as I finde them recorded by themſelues in theſe very words.

The audacious dealings of the Rebels.

To the Commyns of Hawkeſide pariſh Bailiffs, or Conſtables, with all the Hamlets of the ſame.

Welbeloued we greet you well, and whereas our brother Pouerty, and our brother Rogers, goith forward, is openly for the aide & aſiſtance of your faith, and holy Church, and for the reformation of ſuch Abbeys and Monaſteries, now diſſolued and ſubpreſſed without any Iuſt cauſe. Wherefore gudde brethers, Foraſmuch as our ſayd brederyn hath ſend to vs for ayde and helpe, wee doe not onely effectualy deſire you, but alſo vnder the paine of deadly ſinne wee comaunde you, and euery of you, to bee at the ſtoke Greene beſide Hawkeſide-kirke, the Saturday next being the xxviij. day of October by xi. of the Clokke, in your beſt array: as you will make aunſwer before the heigh Iudge at the dreadfull day of Dome, and in the payne of pulling downe your Houſes, and leaſing of your gudds, and your bodies to be at the Capteyns will: For at the place aforeſaid, then and there, yee and we, ſhall take further direction concerning our faith, ſo farre decayed, And for gudde and laudable Cuſtomes of the Country, And ſuch naughty inuentions and ſtrange Articles now accepted and admitted, ſo that our ſaid brother bee ſubdued, they are lyke to goe furthwards to vtter vndoing of the Commyn welth.

Slanderous vntruths againſt the King.

(97) And the more to drawe forward the rude multitude which were forward enough of themſelues, they ſet forth in writing theſe ſlanderous vntruthes againſt the King.

1 The firſt is that no infant ſhall receyue the bleſſed Sacrament of Baptiſme, bott onleſſe an trybett to bee payd to the King.

2 The ſecond is that no man vnder xx[l]. Landes ſhall eyte no brede made of Wheate, ner Capon, chekyn, gois, ner pigge, bott onleſſe to pay a trybett to the King.

3 The third is that for euery ploghe land the King will haue en trybett, with other diuerſe extreme vrgent cauſes, and hertely fare ye well.

The Oath of the holy Pilgrimes.

The oath of the Pilgrims.

Ye ſhall nat enter into this our Pilgrimage of Grace for the Commyn welth, but only for the loue that you doe bere vnto Almyghty Godde, his faith, and to holy Churche militant, the maintenance thereof, to the preſeruation of the Kings perſon, his iſſew, to the purifying of Nobilitie, and to expulſe all vilayne blode, and euill Councellers agaynſt the Commyn welthe, from his Grace and the priuie Counſell of the ſame, and that ye ſhall nat enter into our ſaid Pilgramege, for no particuler proffite to your ſelfe, nor to doe no diſpleaſure to no priuey perſon, but by Counſell for the Commyn welthe, ner ſlee, ner murder for no enuye, but in youre hertis put away all feare and dread, and take afore you the Croſſe of Criſte, and in your herts his faith, the reſtitution of the Churche, the ſubpreſſion of theſe Herytyks, and their opynyons, by all the holle contents of this Booke.

And for the obſeruation of this Oath, heare another commande of the Commiſſioners, as we find it recorded.

To the Bayliffes and Communes of the Towne of Skarboro.

Welbeloyd, we Francys Bygod Knyghte, and Iohn Halom yoman, in the name of all the Communes, commande and charde you, that ye aſſemble your ſelues together mediately vpon recepete hereof, and ſo take thys othe wychys we here ſend vnto yow, and then after in all haſte poſsible to aſsiſt and hayde theis ower brethern, wome wee ſende to you to keepe, and make ſure the Caſtell, Towne, and Port of Skarboro, that no man enter into the ſame Caſtell, that belongys vnto Raſe Euers the yonger Knyghte, nor any outher whiches did not take full parte with the Communes, at ower firſt and laſt aſſemblynge, in whoys name, aethority, or attorney ſoeuer they cume, vnleſſe they haue licence of all the communes, in like manner, yee ſhall truely keepe all ſichys ordinance, and ſhippe to the vſe of the Communes, wythe wyches wee charde you at our late being here, and thys not to faile, vpon payne of yower lyues, yee ſhall refer credence vnto thys meſſyngeres, thus in haſt: Fare yee well, from Settrynton this Mondaye Sancte Mawris daye.

Francis Bigott Knight in the name, and by Commandement of al the Communes.

Againſt theſe rout of Rebels, George Earle of Shrewſbury, not ſtaying for the Kings commiſsion muſtred his men, miſdeemed of many, that he meant to be a Pilgrime himſelfe, vnto which ſuſpectors hee made a loyall Oration, diſclaiming all intention againſt their attempts, how colourable ſo euer they laid their pretence; which done he cauſed his Chaplen to miniſter him an Oath of his loyaltie, before them in the Field. It was likewiſe reported that the Earle of Darby was ſet forward towards them, whome the Pilgrimes well hoped would haue ſided with them, as by their mandate ſent to the Brethren appeares, where is forbid that none of them ſhould aide him, vnleſſe he tooke the Oath: which he neuer meant to aſſay or ſweare to.

The Earle of Shrewſbury maketh againſt the Rebels.

Ex MS. R. Co.

(98) But true it is the King ſent Thomas Duke of Norfolke, Lord Generall againſt them, accompanied with the Marqueſſe of Exceſter, the Earles of Huntingdon and Rutland; who ioining their powers made towards Doncaſter, where the Rebels then lay in their Randiuou; in whoſe ſight immediately they ſet vp their Tents, and determined battell vpon the next day; but on the night betwixt, ſuch fluds of water fell, that the riuer Dun ouerflowed his bancke, and admitted no paſſage ouer the Bridge, which thing was taken as a token from God; and thereupon the Lord Generall offered them Conference, alleaging that the King was tender of his Subiects liues, and very vnwilling to ſhed Chriſtian blood: that their cauſe ſhould be fauourably heard, and iuſt complaints redreſſed, if with ſubmiſsion and duty of Subiects, they would yeeld themſelues & affaires to the Kings mercy; that this their rebellious proceedings, was not onely the forerunning meſſenger of deſtruction to themſelues and partakers, but gaue alſo a great aduantage vnto the Scots, the dangerous enemie vnto the Land, and them all: with theſe and the like perſwaſions the matter was ſo forwarded, that a conference was appointed at Doncaſter, and foure pledges were ſent from the Lord General vnto the

An Answere to the [demaunds] of the Rebelsin Yorkeshire, by the Kings Highnesse.

First, as touching the maintenance of the Faith, the termes bee ſo generall, that it would bee very hard to make certaine anſwere to the ſame; but if they meane the faith of Chriſt, to the which al Chriſten men bee wonly bound: wee declare and proteſt our ſelfe to be that Prince, that doth entend, and hath alwayes minded to liue and die in the maintenance, defence, [and] obſeruation [and] purity of the [of the] ſame. And that no man can or dare ſet his foote by vs in prouing of the contrary. Maruelling therefore much that ignorant people would goe about to take vpon them to inſtruct and teach vs (which hath beene noted [to be] learned) what the faith ſhould be: [And alſo that they being ignorant people bee ſo preſumtius (ſeeing that wee and our hole Clergy in Conuocaon hath in Articles declaryd it) wold take appon them to correct vs all therein.] Or that they would bee ſo ingrate and vnnaturall towards vs their moſt rightfull King, and naturall Soueraigne Lord, without any our deſert, vpon falſe reports or ſurmiſes to ſuſpect vs of the ſame, and giue rather credence to forged light tales, then to the very truth by vs theſe twenty eight yeeres vſed, and by our deedes approued.

To the ſecond which toucheth the maintenance of the Church, and the liberties of the ſames we ſay it is ſo generall a propoſition that without diſtinctions no man with trouth can anſwere it, neither by Gods lawes, nor by the lawes of the Realme. For firſt, the Church which they mean muſt be known: Second, whether thoſe things which they call liberties, and ſay they would maintaine, be things lawfull and beneficiall to the [Princes] comen wealth, or otherwiſe. And theſe knowne wee doubt not but they ſhall bee anſwered according to Gods law, equity and iuſtice. Neuertheleſſe for all their generality this wee dare affirme, that (meaning what Church they liſt) Wee haue done nothing that may not be abiden by, both by Gods lawes and mans lawes, or that is preiudiciall to our common wealth, if our proceedings may bee indifferently conſidered. And in our owne Church of England, whereof wee be the ſupreme head on Earth, we haue done nothing ſo [extremely and] as many of our Predeceſſors haue done, vpon much leſſer [onerous and chargeable to them,] grounds. Wherefore ſithens this Article partaineth nothing to any of our Commons, nor that they beare any thing therin, we cannot but reckon a great vnkindneſſe and vnnaturalneſſe in them, which had leuer a Chorle or twaine ſhould enioy thoſe profites of their Monaſteries, for the ſupportation and maintenance of abominable life, then that we their Prince ſhould receiue the ſame towardes our extreme charges, doon, and daily ſuſtained for their defence againſt forraine enemies.

The third Article toucheth three things; the firſt is the lawes, the ſecond is the common-wealth, the third, the directors of the lawes vnder vs. Touching the Lawes, as it becommeth not blind men to iudge any colours, ne to take vpon them to beeiudges of the ſame: ſo wee dare expreſly and boldly affirme as a thing that may bee eaſily and duely proued; that there were neuer in any One of our Predeceſſors dayes, ſo many wholeſome, commodious and beneficiall Acts made for the common wealth, as haue bin made in our time, & ſithens ſome of them had [credite] [our affaires] [experience] & doing [in the world,] that wold now [parchance] fain pycke them thanke without deſert. For our Lord forbids that both wee and our Councell ſhould haue loſt ſo much time, as not to know better now then wee did in the beginning of our raigne; what were a Common-wealth, and what were againſt the good and commodity of the ſame, ſeeing wee haue beene a King theſe twenty eight yeeres, and by experience learned the perfiteneſſe thereof: and although the folly and vnkindneſſe of ſome will not perchance let them ſo knowledge it, yet wee truſt and doubt not, but the moſt part of our louing Subiects ſpeciallie, thoſe which bee not ſeduced by falſe reports, doe both thinke it, accept it, and finde it ſo. Now touching the Common wealth, what King hath kept his Subiects ſo long in wealth and peace, ſo long without taking or doing wrong one to another; ſo indifferently miniſtred iuſtice to all eſtates both high and low; ſo defended them from all outward enemies: ſo fortifie the frontiers of his Realme to his no little, and in manner ineſtimable charges, and all for their wealthes and ſureties? What King hath giuen among his Subiects moe generall or freer pardons? What King hath beene lother to puniſh his Subiects, or ſhewed more mercy among them? theſe things being ſo true, as no true man can deny them: It is an vnnaturall and an vnkind demeanour of you our Subiects to beleeue or deeme the contrary of it: by whoſe report ſoeuer it ſhould be ſet forth againſt vs. And the beginning of our raigne, where it is ſaid that ſo many Noblemen were Counſellors: we doe not forget who were then Counſellors: for of the Temporalty there were but two worthy to bee called Noble, the oon, the Treaſurer of England, the other the high Steward of our houſhold. Others, as the Lord Marney and Darcy but [ſcant wel] born [meane] Gentlemen, [and] yet of no great lands, till they were promoted by vs, and ſo made Knights and Lords; the reſt were Lawyers and Prieſts, ſauing the two Biſhops of Canterbury and Wincheſter: If theſe then bee the great number of Noblemen, that is ſpoken off, and that our Subiects ſeemed then contented withall, why then bee they not now much better contented with vs, which haue ſo many Nobles indeed, both of birth and condition of our Councell. For firſt of the Temporalty in our Priuy Councell, wee haue the Duke of Norfolke, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marqueſſe of Exceſter, the Lord Steward (when hee is preſent) the Earle of Oxford, the Earle of Suſſex, the Lord Sandes our Chamberlaine, the Lord Admirall Treaſurer of our houſe: Sir William Paulet Comptroller of our houſe. And of the Spiritualtie, the Biſhoppes of [Canterbury,] Wincheſter, Hereford, and Chicheſter: And for becauſe it is more then neceſſary to haue ſome in our Priuy Councell lernyd in our laws, and pacts of the world: wee by the aduiſe of our hole Councell aforenamyd, did elect and chooſe into our Priuie Councell, and alſo into theyr roomes our Chanceler and Priuie Cell, thynking them men in all our opinion, moſt meeteſt for the ſame roomes; and wee with our hole Councell thinke it ryght ſtrange, that yee, which bee but bruts, and inexpert folke, doe take apon yow to appoint vs, [Marke who bee meet for our Counſell and hoo bee not. [Now therefore now how theſe ſeditious perſons which how farre be thus wrongfullie haue borne you thus in hand haue theſe per- falſlie abuſed you,] ſons abuſed,] that recken there were then moe Noblemē in our Priuy Councel then be now: but yet thogh of our great clemency & princely goodnes, we declare now the truth, to pull our ſubiectes from that errour and blindneſſe they were led and trained into, by falſe and vntrue ſurmiſe and report: Wee would againe that euery of them knew, that it appertaineth not to any ſubiect, to preſume to take vpon him, th'appointment of his King and Soueraigne Lords Councell. Ne for our part wee woll take any ſuch thing at any of our Subiects hands. Wherefore wee would that from henceforth they ſhould better remember the duties of good Subiects towards their naturall Liege Lord, and meddle no further of thoſe or ſuch like things, as they haue nothing to doe withall.

name certaine of our Councel to be subuerters both of Gods law, and the lawes of this Realme: Wee doe take and repute them as iust and true Executors both of Gods Laws, and as ferre as their Commissions vnder vs doe extend. And if any of our Subiects can duely prooue the contrary wee shall proceede against them and all other offenders therein, according to iustice, as to our estate and dignity royall doth appertaine. And in case it be but a false and an vntrue reaport, as we verily thinke it is, then it were as meet and standeth aswell with iustice, that they should haue the selfe same punishment, which wrongfully hath obiected this to them, that they should haue had, if they had deserued it. And oon thing among others causeth vs to thinke that this slander should bee vntrue, because it proceedeth from that place, which is both farre distant from that where they inhabite, and also from those people which neuer heard them preach. nor yet knoweth any part of their conuersation. Wherefore we exhort all Ye our Commens to be no more so light of credit in the beleeuing of yuel things spoken of vs your natural Prince and Soueraigne Lord: Nor of any of our Prelates and Counsailors, but to thinke that your King hauing so long raigned ouer you with the aduyse off hys Cõsell hath as good discretion to elect and chuse his Counsailors, as those who so euer they bee that hath put this in your heads or yee other being but ignorant people and ought off all experyens off prynces affaires.

Heere in this finall point which yee our Comens of Yorkeshire, Westmerland, Cumberland, the Bishopriche of Durham, Richmondshire, Crauen, Dent, Sedbarre, and all other places that haue beene seduced to this Insurrection doe desire; and also in the matter of the whole discourse of your Petitions. We verilie thinke that the rest of all our hole Commens of many Cuntreys to whom you be in maner but an handfull, will greatly disdaine and not beare it, that you take vpon you to set order to vs and them, and specially to vs [being] Soueraign Lord to you both: [you being rebelles]

And that [because you be rebells,] you would make them as bearers and pertakers of your mischief, willing them to take perdon for Insurrections which verelie we thinke and doubt not they neuer minded: but like true Subiects to the contrary haue both with heart and deede been ready at our call to defend both vs and themselues: and now for our part as to your demands, we let you wit, that perdon of such things as you demaund lyeth onely in the will and pleasure of the Prince: but it seemeth by your lewde proclamations and salfe conductes, that there bee amongs you which take vpon them both the parts of Kings and Counsailors. Which neither by vs nor by the Generall consent of our Realme hath been admitted to any such roome. What arrogancie is then in those wretches being also of none experience, to presume to raise you our Subiects without Commission or authoritie: yee and against vs vnder a cloked colour of your wealth and in our name, and as the successe and ende would declare if wee should not be more mercifull vnto you then you haue deserued to your owne vtter confusions. Wherefore wee late all you our said subiects againe witt, that were it not that our Princely heart cannot recken this your shamefull insurrection and most ingrate and vnnaturall rebellion to bee done of malice or rancour, but rather by a lightnesse giuen in manner by a naughty nature to a Comunalty, and a wonderous sudden surreption of Gentlemen: We must needs haue executed an other maner of punishment, then if you will humbly knowledge your fault, and submit your selfe to our mercie, wee entend to doe [as by our proclamations we dought yee be informed.]

Fynys.

The effect that the Kings reply wrought, is manifest by his free perdons sent vnto the offenders, by Proclamation diuulged by his messenger at Armes and his trumpet throughout the North parts, the tenour whereof from the Originall is, as followeth.

King Henrie's free pardon by Proclamation.

All bee yt, that yowe the Kings Subiects and Commons dwelling and inhabiting in the Shires of Yorke, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland, the Bishopricke of Durham, the City of Yorke, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Kyngston vpon Hull, and the Shire of the same, the Towne of Newcastle vpon Tyne, and the Shire of the same, and in other Shires, Towns, Dalis, Places priuileged, the Fraunchises and Liberties within the limits of the said Shires, Cities, and Townes, or any of them, or being reputed or taken for any part, parcell or number of any of them, and such other the Kings said Subiects, inhabited in the Towne of Lancaster, or elsewhere, by North, in the Shire of Lancaster, haue now of late attempted and committed manifest and open rebellion, against his most royall Maiesty, whereby was like to haue ensewde, the vtter rewin and distruction of thes hole Cuntreis, to the grete comforte and auancement of your awncient enemes the Scots, which as his Hienes is credably enformed, doe with a great Redines watche vpon the same, and to the high displeasure of God, who streitely commandeth you to obay your Soueraigne Lord and King, in all things, and not with violence to resist his will or Commandement, for anie cause whatsoeuer it be: Neuertheless the Kings royall Magesty, perceiuing as well by the Articles of their partners sent to his Hyenes: As also dewly enformed by credible reports, that their said offences proceeded of ignorance, and by occasion of sundrie false talis, neuer minded or entended by his Hienes, or any of his Councell, but most craftely contriued, and most spitefully set abroade amongs you, by certaine malitious and seditious persons; and thereupon his Hyghnes inclined to extend his most gratious mercy and pitty towards you, hauing chefe charge of you vnder God, both of your sowles and bodies, and desiring rather the preseruation of the same, and your reconciliation, by his mereifull meyns, than by the order and rigour of Iustice to punish you according to your demeryts, of his inestimable goodnes, benignity, mercy, and pety, and at your most humble petitions and submissions made vnto his Highnes, he is content & plaised to gise and grant, and by his present Proclamation doth gyue & grant vnto you al, and to al & euerie your confederates whereseoeuer they dwell, of estate, degree, or what condition soeuer you or they bee, or by what name or names soeuer they or you be, or may bee called, his Generall and free pardon for all manner of treasons, rebellions, insurrections, misprisions of treasons, murders, robberies, felons, and of al accessaries of the same, and of euerie of them, vnlawfull assembles, vnlawfull Conuenticles, vnlawfull speaking of wordes, confederacies, riots, rowts: And all other trespasses, offencies and contempts, done and committed by you, or anie of you against the Kings Magestie, his Crowne or dignitie roiall, within and from the time of the beginning of the saide Rebellion whensoeuer it was, vnto the present day of proclaiming of this Proclamation, and of all paines, iudgements, and executions, of death, and all other penalties, forfeitures, fynes, and forfeitures of Landes, Tenements, Hereditaments, Goods or Cattels by any of your forfeitures incurred by reason of the premises, or any of them; which Fines, Forfeitures, Lands, Tenements, Heredstaments, Goods, and Cattels, the Kings said Highnes of his speciall grace, and mere motion by these presents, giueth to such of you, as haue or should haue forfeited, or loste the same, by occasion of the premisses or any of them: And also his Highnes is pleased, and contented, that you and euerie of you from time to time, shall and may have vpon your sewtes to be made hereafter in his Chauncery, his said and most gracious and free pardon vnder his great Seale concerning the premisses, without any further Bill or Warrant to bee obtained for the same, and without paying any thing for the great seale thereof: And that you and euerie of you from time to time, may freely and liberallie sewe for his said pardon, when and as often as it shall like you, without anie trouble, vexation or impeachment

for the premiſſes, or anie of them, by his heires, or by anie his Officiaries, Miniſters, or Subiects, by anie manner of meanes or in anie manner of wiſe. Prouided alwaies, that you and euerie of you in token of a perfect declaration and knowledge, that ye doe hartilie lament and be ſorrie for your ſaid offencies, ſhall make your humbly ſubmiſsion vnto his Highnes, in the preſence of his right truſtie and right intirely beloued Coſens and Concellairs: the Duke of Norforlke, and the Earle of Shrewſburie his Lieutenants Generall, or any of them, or to their Deputy or Deputies of them, or any of them, or ſuch other perſon, or perſons as the Kings Highnes ſhall appoint for the ſame: Furthermore the Kings moſt roiall Mageſty, ſtreitely chargeth and commandeth, that you and euery of you, ſhall from henceforth, like trew and faithfull Subiects vſe your ſelues, in Gods peace, and his, according to the dueties of alleagance, and that you ſhall in no wiſe hereafter, attempt to make or procure, any ſuch rebellion, intent, vnlawfull Aſſemblies, Riots, Rowts, and Conſpirattons, nor at the Commandement, nor by the Authority of any perſon, of what eſtate or degree, or for what cauſe ſoeuer it be, ſhall ariſe in any forcible manner, and array, vnles it be at the ſpeciall commandement of the Kings Highnes, or his Lieutenant ſufficiently auctoriſed for the ſame. In witnes whereof the Kings moſt royall Mageſty, hath cauſed this his Proclamation to be made Patent, and ſealed with his great ſayle at Richemounte the IX. day of December in the XXVIII. yeere of his Reigne. 1536.

Pexſall.

Notwithſtanding this Generall pardon and merciſull dealings of the King a new Inſurrection was raiſed in the North, wherin many of the former were now againe Actors, as by name Robert Aske whom the King had not onely pardoned, but alſo highly rewarded, the Lord Dacres, Sir Robert Conſtable, Sir Francis Bygod, Pulmer, Percy, Hamilton, Tempeſt and Lumley, all of them put to death, as they well deſerued.

(100) Theſe ſtirres thus quieted and the Statesmen at leaſure to preuent the like, a Commiſsion came foorth to purge the Churches of Idols; and to ſuppreſſe the Monaſteries to the Kings vſe, granted vnto him by Parliament: the one of them, the onely working cauſe, through the gaine that was got by ignorant deuotion, and gadding on pilgrimage, and the other, the Neſt and very receptacle of all traiterous attempters, againſt the peace of the Land and Supremacy of the Crowne. The abuſe of the firſt was ſolemnly ſhewed at Pauls Croſſe in London, vpon Sunday the twenty foure of February, by Doctor Iohn Fiſher Biſhop of Rocheſter, where the Roode of Boxley in Kent, commonly called the Rood of Grace, made with diuers vices to bow downe and to lift vp it ſelfe, to ſhake, and to ſtirre both Heads, hands, and feet, to rowle the eies, mooue the lippes and to bend the browes; was then broken and pulled in peeces. So likewiſe the Images of our Lady of Walſingham and Ipſwich, ſet and beſprinkled with Iewels, and Gemmes, with diuers others both of England and Wales; were brought to London, and burnt at Chelſey before the Lord Crumwell. Monaſteries, whoſe number (as Cambden doth account them) were ſixe hundred fourty fiue, beſides fourſcore and tenne Colledges, them of Oxford and Cambridge not accounted: of Hoſpitals one hundred and tenne, and of Chaunteries and free Chappels two thouſand, three hundred, ſeuenty foure, all of them almoſt were then borne downe with the ſudden deluge of thoſe tempeſtuous times, whilſt the world ſtood amazed, King Henrie proceeded, and the Clergy men groaned vnder their owne deſtructions; among theſe the Shrine of Thomas Becket was defaced, which did abound with more then Princely riches: whoſe meaneſt part was pure gold, garniſhed with many precious ſtones, as Eraſmus that ſaw it, hath written, whereof the chiefeſt was a rich Gemme of France, offered by King Lewis, who aſked and obtained (you may be ſure, he buying it ſo deare) that no paſſenger betwixt Douer and Whitesand ſhould periſh by ſhipwracke; his bones by Stephen Langton had beene laide in a golden Shrine, his name canonized, and the day of his death made annually holy, ſuch concurſe of Pilgrime, ſuch preſsing to touch him, and ſuch creeping and kneeling to his Tombe, that the prints of their deuotion in the Marble ſtones, remaines to this day; euery Pillar reſounding the miracles of this reputed Martyre, and the Church it ſelfe dedicated to Chriſt, forced to giue place to the name of Saint Thomas. The Timber worke of this Shrine was couered with plates of gold, damasked and embоſſed with wires of gold, garniſhed with broches, images, angels, precious ſtones, and great Orient Pearles: all theſe defaced filled two Cheſts and were for price of an vneſtimable value. But in ſteede of theſe Dagons, the Bible in Engliſh was commanded to bee read in all Churches, and Regiſter Bookes of weddings, Chriſtenings and Burials in euery of them to be kept.

(101) The yeerely reuenewes of theſe, as they were valewed by the Commiſſioners, at their ſubuerſions amounted to an vneſtimable ſumme, as appeareth by the Original Booke it ſelfe preſented to the King, whereof more ſhall be ſpoken in the end of this chapter, and yet moſt of them rated at Robinhoods penny-worthes, what their rents were, a libell ſcattered abroad, and read to the king, by demonſtration did proue, wherein was accounted, that vnto the fiue Orders of Friers, (euery houſholder paying them fiue pence the Quarter) the ſumme of fourty three thouſand, three hundred, thirty three pound, ſixe ſhillings and eight pence ſterling, was paid them by yeere, beſides the reuenewes of their owne lands, which was not a little, ſo that not without cauſe many entred into a Monaſticall life, rather to liue at full, and without cares of this world, then to feede the flocke of Chriſt, or to winne them, and not theirs, after the example of the Apoſtle. For the Teſtament of Chriſt, was vnto moſt of theſe, as a booke ſealed with ſeauen ſeales, and their mouthes vnmuzled they did deuoure, but not tread out the Corne, ſo that the Sunne by their doctrine ſeemed to be darkened, as with ſmoke, and themſelues to be the Locuſtes that ouerſpread the ſuperficies of the Earth, whoſe faces were like men, pretending humanity, their haire like women in ſhew of modeſty, their Crownes of counterfeited gould, ſignifying their vſurped authoritie, their teeth like Lyons ſhewing their Tyrannie, their force like horſes prepared for battell, their habergions of Iron betokening their ſtrength, the ſound of their wings, the thundering out their mandates like to the rumbling of Chariots in warre, their Tailes (the falſe Prophets) hauing ſtings like vnto Scorpions, and their King the bad Abaddon, euen the Angell of the Bottomeleſſe pit. All thoſe alluſions moſt aptly fitting theſe Cloiſtered Friers, who now grown to the height of their ſinnes, their skirts were diſcouered, that their ſhame might appeare; being the only men then laid open to the world.

(102) Againſt whoſe doctrine, (beſides many others thers in other forreine parts) two in the daies of K. Henry the fourth, the first English King that put anie to death for the doctrine of Rome; (omitting Sir Iohn Oldcastle and others, that died for the Gospels defence, in the daies of King Henry the fift) foure in the raigne of innocent Henrie the sixt. One in the daies of King Edward the fourth; and tenne in the time of King Henry the seauenth, sealed the doctrine against the papall religion with their bloud; all of them being martyred before that Martin Luther wrote. And in the raigne of this King twenty sixe suffered the fire, before the flames thereof could be quenched, which a while was done by the meanes of good Queene Anne, till afterwards they mounted higher, when the sixe Articles were made: but because this Ecclesiasticke text is handled elsewhere, and seemeth vnsociable to our begunne Subiect, we will referre the Reader for these matters vnto the industrious paines of that worthy and euer venerable man M. Fox, taken in his Acts & Monuments of Ecclesiasticall history.

(103) The Monasteries thus dissolued, and the Reuenewes thereof conuerted to temporall vses, King Henry ranne in great obloquie of many forraine Potentates, but most especially of the Pope; who with Cardinall Poole instigated diuers Princes in Christendom to inuade England thus fallen from his faith: Yea, & home-borne Subiects disliking the course for Papisticall subuersion, by secret working sought to depriue King Henry, and to raise vp Reynold Poole vnto the Regall dignity, as by their inditements appeareth. The persons conuicted, were Lord Henry Courtney Marquesse of Excester, & Earle of Deuonshire, the sonne of Lady Katherine, the seuenth daughter of King Edward the fourth: Henrie Poole Lord Montacute, with Sir Geffrey his brother, and Sir Edward Neuill brother to the Lord of Abergauenny. These Pooles were the sonnes of Lady Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence: and of these Reinold Poole once Deane of Excester, and now Cardinall at Rome was accounted the onely man.

(104) And this foresaid Lord Marquesse had formerly beene in such fauour with King Henry, that at his going into France he ordained him his Heire apparant, though at his returne vpon graue deliberation, hee saw it better policy to plucke him down then was vsed in setting him vp, lest in acting his part vpon that infectiue stage, hee put the land to as much trouble as the arreared Duke Richard of Yorke had done, after hee was ordained heire apparant, which Title produced the Tragedy of his raiser King Henry the sixt, and now hauing him and his Abetters vpon the aduantage, the better to secure his owne Estate, hee caused the heades of this Lord Marquesse with the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Neuill to bee cut off vpon Tower-hill.

(105) The King then a Widdower, since the death of Queene Iane, who departed this life two yeeres before, meant to maintaine what hee had done, maugre all opposites: which the better to effect, by the Counsell of Lord Cromwell, he sought and obtained the alliance of the Princes of Germany, and heard the motion for marriage with the Lady Anne sister to William Duke of Cleue, whose other sister Fredericke Duke of Saxony had espoused, a great fauourer of the Gospell, and maintainer of Martin Luther the zealous Preacher and professor thereof. But whether for the death of Anne Bullen, or that hee would haue his wiues sister bestowed neerer at home (which thing hee pretended) a great hinderer hee was of that match. But the Lady sent into England, and married vnto King Henry, seemed nothing pleasing in his eye; which Stephen Gardiner then Bishoppe of Winchester perceiuing, thought it a fitte subiect for him to worke vpon, against the Lord Cromwell the maker of the match; hee therefore instigated iealousies dayly into the Kings eare, first exasperating the hatred of the Princes of Germany to him-wards, and especially of Duke Fredericke his compulsiue brother in Law, the Emperor, French Kings, Scots and the Pope, all seeking at once to raise their powers against England. The ciuill tumults lately passed, and new commotions greatly to be feared, hee letted not to remember, and all to nip the spring of the new spreading Gospell, whereby this wise Politician in the end got six such Articles against it, as the Consistory of Hell could deuise no worse. Whose cruelties were such that not long after, and in the dayes of this King, some of those Acts were againe repealed, and some of them qualified, as too sharpe and searching into the bloud of the Kings best Subiects.

The sixe Articles deuised.

(106) The fruite of these bloud-thirsty instigators, the Lord Cromwell, and Lady Anne of Cleue soon tasted of, he by imprisonment and death, and she by disgrace and diuorce; hauing been his wife from Ianuary to Iune, in all which time the King refrained the mutuall knowledge of her body, for the dislike hee had of her person, euen at the first sight, as himselfe called to witnesse the Lord Cromwell then Prisoner in the Tower, for whose report hee wrote a Letter with his owne hand; and shee good Lady no other cause alleadged, was diuorced by Parliament, when also it was enacted that shee should no longer bee styled Queene. The Lord Cromwell was charged by the Lord Rich, and Sir George Throgmorton with speaking of certaine generall words, not excepting therein the Kinges person, which neuerthelesse were thought so sleight and insufficient to take away his life, that his enemies feared to put it to the triall of his Peeres, lest he should bee acquitted by them, as the Lord Dacres of the North not many yeeres before had beene; wherfore there was a Bill drawne to attaint him of heresie and Treason, in generall words, rather then in particular proofes, which when hee was dead, passed in both houses of Parliament with the Kinges assent:

Queene Anne diuorced by Parliament.

Cromwell after his death attainted by Parliament. Ex MS.

(107) Howbeit Saunders that seldome speakes well of the Gospels professors, will haue him to die for the breach of a Law made by himselfe, which was, that one appeached of treason, should not come in the Kings presence, till he had tried himself not guilty; but besides that wee find no such Act by him made: his inditement doth not charge him with treason, but with setting at liberty certain persons committed for misprision of treason and heresie; for fauouring and maintaining the translation of hereticall bookes into English; for bearing out Barnes and other hereticall Preachers; that himselfe was an heretike, and had spoken words, great words for the vpholding of his said religion, which were, that the King should not change it if hee would: for these things he was attainted by Parliament of high Treason, and that grounded either vpon a Statute made in the fiue and twenty of Edward the third, or else by the explanation of that Act which referreth the exposition of Treasons to the Parliament, and so no way did Cromwel deuise or make any law of treason, which himselfe first fell into, as that partiall Romanist hath said.

D. Sanderi.

No such things as Sanders suppoleth against Cromwell.

No act by Cromwell to cause his owne death.

(108) But most sure it is, that the Kings affection, altogether guided by the fairest obiect, found no other point in the Compasse to fixe his variable eye, besides that onely, which by his seeming was touched by the Loadstone of nature, and the same to bee the Lady Katherine Howard, daughter to Edward the brother of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, against whom Cromwell standing in the defence of Queene Anne, and vsing words of dislike in the Lady Katherine, distastfull vnto the King, was thereupon apprehended (his enemy so working) and vpon the twenty eight of Iuly suffered death with the stroke of the Axe vpon Tower-hill, with whom was beheaded the Lord Hungerford of Heitesbery, neither so Christianly suffering, nor so quietly dying for his offence committed against nature.

Cromwels dislike of the Lady Katherine the cause of his death.

(109) The ſword thus vnſheathed vpon the necks of the Nobility; ſtrucke off the head of Margaret Counteſſe of Salisbury, daughter and heire vnto George Duke of Clarence, and mother vnto Reynald Poole Cardinall, being neither arraigned nor tried, but condemned by Parliament as Cromwell had bin. And the Lord Leonard Gray in this preſent yeere loſt his head for treaſon, the twenty eight of Iune. And the next day following Thomas Fines Lord Dacres of the South, died at Tyborne for killing a priuate man in a fray. Neither was it put vp, vntill that the heades of Queen Katherine Howard, and the Lady Iane Rochford were ſtricken off, the one for Adultery, the other for concealement, as was alleadged, the parties offending were Francis Dereham, and Thomas Culpepper, Dereham before ſhee was Queene, and Culpepper after, who both were executed at Tiburne, the tenth of December, and the twelfth of February following, Miſtreſſe Katherine Howard (for ſo in the Act of her Attainture ſhee is called) who had beene ſtiled and receiued Queene for the ſpace of ſixe moneths, and foure dayes, with the Lady Iane then widow, and late wife vnto George Bullen, Lord Rochford, were both of them brought vnto a Scaffold raiſed vppon the hill within the Tower, where they in lamentable paſſions ſuffered death.

Since the eight of Auguſt proceeding.

Queene Katherine and the Lady Iane Rochford beheaded.

(110) Howſoeuer thoſe times afforded ſuch Queenes to the Kings bed, or himſelfe vnfortunate in making his choiſe: yet many of no meane iudgement haue rather accuſed King Henry for his changing and variable affections, then thinke them guilty in the breach of Matrimony. Of Anne wee haue ſeene what hath beene ſaid, and of this Queene let vs heare what ſhee proteſted after her condemnation to Doctor White Biſhoppe of Wincheſter her laſt Confeſſor, and by him deliuered to a noble young Lord of her name, and neere alliance: Her words were theſe: As to the Act my reuerend Lord for which I ſtand condemned, God and his holy Angels I take to witneſſe vpon my ſoules ſaluation, that I die guiltleſſe, neuer hauing ſo abuſed my Soueraignes bed: what other ſinnes and follies of youth I haue committed, I will not excuſe; but am aſſured that for theſe, God hath brought this puniſhment vpon me, and will in his mercy remit them, for which I pray you, pray with me, vnto his ſonne and my Sauiour Chriſt.

(111) As theſe then in caſe of Treaſons eyther acted or intended, ended their liues; ſo others in caſe of conſcience (though diuerſly affected) came to their deathes, and that by force of the Statutes enacted vnder this King; whereof one was the aboliſhing of the Pope, and the oath of Supremacy, the refuſers of either made offenders in ſtate of high Treaſon, and the other in caſe of religion, when the ſixe Articles enacted by Parliament, was made Hereſie and death, to ſuch as held or taught the contrary, which Articles were thus concluded in both the houſes of Parliament with conſent of the King.

The oath of ſupremacie enacted.

The ſixe bloody Articles enacted.

1 That after the words of conſecration ſpoken by the Prieſt, the reall and naturall body and bloud of Chriſt, as hee was conceiued and crucified, was in the Sacrament, and no other ſubſtance conſiſting, in the forme of bread and wine, beſides the ſubſtance of Chriſt God and man.

2 That the communion in both kinds was not neceſſarie vnto ſaluation, the fleſh onely in forme of bread, ſufficient for the Laity.

3 That Prieſts after they haue receiued orders might not marry by the law of God.

4 That the vowes of chaſtity either in man or woman, ought by Gods law to be obſerued, and by which they are exempted from other liberties of Chriſtian people.

5 That priuate Maſſes was neceſſary for the people, and agreeable to the law of God.

6 That auricular confeſſion was expedient to be reteined, and continued in the Church of God.

Theſe Statutes I ſay aſwell the one as the other, brought many to their ends, which otherwiſe were very good Subiects, and worthy inſtruments in the common weale: for offending in the firſt, there died Biſhoppe Fiſher, and Sir Thomas More, beſides many Abbots, Priors, and Friers, and among them, in Smithfield the Welſh rode ſet Frier Forreſt on fire, according to the prophecy very rife in their mouthes, that this holy rode ſhould ſet a whole forreſt on fire. For the other ſuffered in flames, many godly Chriſtians, whereof Robert Barnes a reuerend Doctor, and worthy miniſter of Chriſt, the firſt reducer (as M. Fox reporteth) of the Vniuerſity of Cambridge from rudeneſſe and barbarity, vnto good literature and learning, was with the firſt: And Anne Aſkew a Gentlewoman of an incomparable dexterity one of the laſt, who, aboue the weakeneſſe of her ſexe moſt valiantly ſtoode againſt the violence of the time.

Anne Aſkew ſtory. Ja. Bale Cent. fol. 669.

This young heifer (ſaith hee) abiding no yoake, a coy dame, and of very euill fame, left the company of Maſter Kyme, to gadde vp and downe a Goſſpelling, and Goſſipping where ſhee might, and ought not, but eſpecially in London, and neere the Court, now ſhee being faire and but twenty fiue yeers old at her death, doth eaſily ſhew what may be ſuſpected of her life, and the myſticall ſpeeches and demands of the Kings Counſell touching her departure from her husband, were grounded vpon ſomewhat, eſpecially in that ſhee called her ſelfe Anne Askew alias Kyme. Thus farre this ſcandalizing man hath accuſed this holy Anne by the outward appearance of her youth and beauty: as holy Anna by Eli was accuſed of drunkenneſſe when her heart was moſt feruent, in ſupplications to her God, and his partiall pen made the fanne to ſift the wheate of her holy conuerſation to finde out ſome chaffe, whereof none is free, nor is ſhee to be condemned vpon the imagerie of his ſuſpicious head (who vndoubtedly would haue told all if any thing could haue beene found) whereas ſhee in the vigour of beauty and weakeneſſe of her Sexe, reſiſted the gaine-ſaiers of the truth with her deareſt blood: teſtifying from the Priſons her faith and conſtancy, and from the Racke preached Chriſt, whereon moſt vnhumanely and againſt kind, ſhee was twice tormented; and laſtly ſealed her teſtimonie in Smithfield through the flames of fire: being borne to the place of her death in a Chaire, her bones ſo diſiointed by the Racke that ſhee could not goe.

For the truth is (ſaith hee) that the Kings ſickeneſſe and death ſhortly enſuing was the chiefe cauſe of her eſcape; and the error of the Lord Chancellor Wriotheſley, who let fall out of his boſome, the Kings hand and commiſſion for carrying her to the Tower gaue occaſion (the paper found and brought her) to goe and humble her ſelfe to the King; the principal occaſion againſt her, was Heretical Books, found in her cloſet, both brought & ſent her by Anne Askew, whereof the witneſſes were the Lady Herbert, Lady Iane, Lady Tyrwit, and others.* Indeed it is true that by Gods prouidence ſuch papers were let fal out of the Lord Chancellors boſome conteining certaine Articles againſt her, with a warrant to commit her to the Tower, whereunto the Kings hand was ſubſcribed: which being found was preſently brought vnto the Queene, whereof the vnexpected content ſo deepely touched her tender heart, that foorthwith ſhee fell into great feares, laments, and a moſt heauy melancholy, and was in ſuch danger of death, that the King came to viſit her, hauing not gone foorth of his Chamber of many dayes before; whereat ſhee ſo reioiced, as ſhee began to amend: and to acknowledge her like loue and duty, the next night following, repaired to the Kings Bed-chamber, accompanied onely with the Lady Herbert her ſiſter, and the Lady Iane the Kings neece, carrying the Candle before her, of whoſe preſence the King ſeemed to be moſt deſirous; and preſently falling in talke of Religion, began to debate ſome queſtion thereof with the Queene, demanding to haue her reſolutions therein, but ſhee knowing that his nature was not to be croſt, and the foreneſſe of his legge to encreaſe his choller, made him anſwere that ſhe was a woman, accompanied with many imperfections, but his Maieſty wiſe and indicious, of whom ſhee muſt learne as of her Lord and Head, for ſo God hath appointed you (ſaid ſhee) the Supreame Head of vs all, of whom next vnto him I will euer learne. Not ſo, by Saint Mary, ſaid the King, you are become a Doctor Kate to inſtruct vs, and not to be inſtructed by vs as often heeretofore we haue ſeene. Indeede (ſaid ſhee) if your Maieſtie haue ſo conceiued, I haue beene miſtaken in my meaning, who haue euer held it prepoſterous for a woman to inſtruct her Lord. And whereas I haue heeretofore held talke with your highneſſe touching Religion, it was to learne of your Maieſty ſome excellent point which my ſelfe ſtood in doubt of: and ſometimes to the end that you might with leſſe griefe paſſe ouer this paineful time of your infirmity, wherein if by my ouermuch boldneſſe I haue failed in the latter, yet haue I not done in the former, to my no ſmall benefit and comfort. And is it euen ſo ſweet heart? (quoth the King) why then, are we friends, and ſo kiſſing her, gaue her leaue to depart. But the day drawne on for her apprehenſion, and the King diſpoſed to take the ayre, ſent for the Queene to walke in the Garden, himſelfe accompanied onely with two Gentlemen, and ſhee with the three foreſaid Ladies. Whenas ſuddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden, with purpoſe to haue apperhended and carried the Queene to the Tower; whoſe malepert approach the King greatly miſliked, and ſternely beholding him, ſtept aſide, ſaluting him with the names of knaue, foole, and beaſt, bidding auaunt out of preſence. The Queene ſeeing the King chafed, but knew not the cauſe, indeauoured by all meanes to pacifie his Maieſtie, and intreated for the Lord Chancellour, whoſe fault as ſhee thought and alleaged, was rather through miſimpriſion then will, and therfore, ſaid ſhe, I wil become an humble ſuiter for him vnto your Highneſſe. Ah poore ſoule (quoth the King) thou little knoweſt Kate how euill he deſerueth this grace at thy hands: of my word (ſweet heart) hee hath beene towards thee a verie knaue. But in following this tract of blood, flowed from the fountaine of the ſixe Articles, wee haue ſtepped ouer ſome other occurrences that happened ſomewhat before this time, vnto which with thy patience, good Reader, we will returne againe.

(114) King Henrie by order of Parliament hauing aſſumed the Stile and Title of King of Ireland, with the ſubmiſſion of moſt of the Iriſh Nobility, Iames his Nephew, King of Scotland, tooke it not well, for that, as Liſley ſaith, a great part of Ireland, eſpecially in the North, had been in poſſeſsion of the Scotiſhmen for many hundred of yeeres before. Theſe diſcontents conceiued, King Henrie well perceiued; and becauſe hee would haue no ill will ſo neere him, that had ſo many enuiers abroad, he ſent vnto King Iames that it would pleaſe him to repaire vnto the City of Yorke, where he would meet him, to conferre for the wealth of both the Realmes, which at firſt was granted, but vpon better aduiſe, vnaccompliſhed, his Counſellors mouing the dangers; and his Clergy the feares, leſt their Religion ſhould be changed to the offence of his confederates the Pope, the Emperour, and the French King.

The Kings of England and Scotland appoint to meet at Yorke.

(115) The vnkindnes growing from this ſmall ſparke, was preſently kindled into great flames, for Commiſſioners being ſent from both Kings, to view the limits of either Kingdome, they fell at ods about a ſmall peece of ground, and from that tooke occaſion of emulations and warres: to proſecute which King Henry prepared an Armie, and ſent them into Scotland vnder the Conduct of the Duke of Norfolke, accompanied with the Earles of Shrewſbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Angus and Rutland. Theſe paſsing the Engliſh Marches, did much hurt in the Kingdome of Scotland. To withſtand whom King Iames gathered a power, of fiue and thirty ſtrong, and at Fallaw more meant to haue bidden the Duke battell, which as that writer related, was not then minded to doe, but made againe into England, and paſsing the water Tweed, ſuſtained great loſſe by the couragious purſuit of the Lord Huntly. King Iames vpon a luſty courage meaning to repaire the Scots loſſes with the Engliſh ſpoiles, was very forward to follow the Duke into their Borders, but the Scotiſh Nobility wiſely waying the danger of warre, by no meanes would either aſſent, or aſſiſt him out of his owne kingdome, affirming it honour ſufficient, to haue forced the Engliſh backe with no little loſſe.

An expedition into Scotland.

The Scotiſh noblemen refuſe to inuade England.

(116) King Iames diſcontented at his Nobles denials, made towards the Borders himſelfe; where, mouing the Lord Maxewell, Lord Warden of the weſt Borders, with many other men of ſpeciall fauour and account, to inuade England, whereunto they gaue their conſents. Theſe paſſing the Riuer Eske, did ſome ſmall dammage vpon the Weſterne Borderers, whereof Thomas baſtard Dacres, and * Iacke of Muſgraue, as Hollinſhed cals them, ſent word to Thomas Wharton, Lord Warden for the King vpon the Weſt Marches: But the Scots comming forward, they were forced to prepare for fight before the Lord Wharton could come, and out of their ſmal company left a ſtand vpon the ſide of a hill.

(117) The Scots aduanced forward with no little hope, were preſently danted with the ſight of theſe men, and verily thought that the Lord Wharton had aſſembled his Charge, or that the Duke of Norfolke with a great Army were come to their reſcue, whereupon they began to conſult what was beſt to be done, and demanding who was deputed Lieutenant by the King, Oliuer Sinclere of no great parts nor honorable parentage, being lifted vp vpon the Shoulders of two Souldiers, ſhewed forth the Kings Commiſſion, wherein himſelfe was appointed their Generall, and whereat howſoeuer it was written or read, the Lords tooke no little diſdaine that ſo many more worthy, honourable, and approued Captaines of the Field, ſhould be lead by this his Minion, but no Seruant of Mars. In whoſe contempt and for the indiſcretion of their King, they ſuffred themſelues to bee taken Priſoners, and willingly loſt the daye.

For griefe of which loſſe, and ſuſpition of his Nobility; King Iames fell into a melancholy Paſſion, which the birth of his new borne Princeſſe rather increaſed, then gaue him any cõfort, ſo as hee deceaſed the foureteenth day of December following, foreſhewing (ſaith Leſlie) great troubles to follow in Scotland.

The death of K. Iames of Scotland.

(119) Newes brought neere at one inſtant, of the death of King Iames, & birth of the Princeſſe his daughter, King Henry intended to doe that by the match of a marriage, which long had beene aſſayed by the ſword of Mars: all things ſo conſorting as it did, he hauing one onely ſonne, then aboue fiue yeres of age, and Scotland no heire beſide this new borne daughter; their yeeres ſuiting a conſent for marriage, the whole Iland offering both the ioynter and dowry, and that which moſt moued, their chiefe Nobility in his owne hands, to be moulded for this deſigne, as if heauen it ſelfe had bid the banes.

A marriage intended betwixt Prince Edward, and the young Queene of Scotland.

(120) Thoſe Priſoners therefore which had remained in the Tower only two daies, vpon the twenty one of December, he ſent for to Weſtminſter, the Earles and Lords all ſuited in Gownes of blacke damaske, furred with Cunny, where after ſome words of friendly reproofe, they were beſtowed among the Engliſh Nobility, who vſed them according to their eſtates: and the third day in Chriſtmas were inuited to the Court at Greenewich, where they went before the King to his Chappell, were royally feaſted, and the motion then made for the eſtabliſhing of peace, by the Coniunction of the two Princes, whereunto the Scotiſh were as willing as the Engliſh, & proffered all forward aſsiſtance to haue it accompliſhed. So that theſe Nobles were deliuered without other ranſome, and richly rewarded at their departure from Court.

The Scotiſh priſoners honourably entertained.

The Scotiſh priſoners relealed without Ranſome.

(121) Theſe returned into Scotland, declared what they had done, and ſo effectually followed the buſines, that in a Parliament aſſembled of the three Eſtates, the marriage was confirmed, and a peace proclaimed to continue betwixt the two Realmes the ſpace of tenne yeeres, which agreements were ſent into England by honourable Ambaſſadors, and there interchangeably ſealed betwixt theſe Potent Eſtates. But Cardinall Beton Archbiſhop of Saint Andrewes, fearing leaſt Scotland would change the Church Orders, as England had done (the Bible already read in their owne language, and the Popes vſurped power called in Queſtion, as then it began to be, by the feruent preaching of Frier Guiliam, to the great liking of moſt of the Lords) made ſome exceptions againſt the Earle Arraine the new choſen Gouernour, and ſecond perſon in the Land, being neereſt in blood to the young Queene. And the French King not liking this vnion with England, ſought by all meanes to breake the ſame match: to effect which, he ſent the Earle of Lennox to perſwade with the Gouernour, with great proffers and promiſes of aſsiſtance, but finding him faithfull vnto King Henry, preſently made faction for the French, wherein hee drew the Queene mother, the Earles Huntly, Argile, Montroſſe, Menteith, and many more Peeres, the Cardinall amongſt them euer the chiefe.

(122) Earle Lennox thus growne into credite with the Queene mother, and made ſtrong by her adherents that fauoured the French, preſently claimed to be Gouernour of Scotland, being the ſecond perſon of degree in the Realme, and withall to haue the cuſtody of the young Queene, who with her mother were forthwith taken from Linlithqw vnder the charge of the Gouernour Arraine, and brought vnto Striueling ſtrongly guarded, with the continuall preſence of the Lords, Leuinſton, Erskwin, Flemming, and Ruthwen, leaſt Queene Mary ſhould be conueyed into England vnto King Henry. Theſe violent courſes, cauſed great Emulations among the Scotiſh Nobility, each of them ſiding as their affections were ſetled, but laſtly agree to ſet the Crowne on their young Queenes head: prepared for the ſolemnity, whereunto all the Lords came, excepting thoſe that ſtood for England, and from them the Gouernour with much adoe was drawne to be preſent at the Coronation: but that accompliſhed, and the ſtate affaires conſulted vpon, it was agreed that the French Kings ſuite ſhould be fauoured, and that the Earle Arran ſhould be Gouernour ſtill, whereat Earle Lennox conceiued ſuch diſpleaſure, as he became wholy for King Henrie, & ioined himſelfe with the Earles of Angus, Glencarne, and Caſsils, the Lords, Maxwel, Summerwell Gray, and others that ſtood with the Engliſh for the match with Prince Edward.

(123) King Henry then hearing what was done, and intended; ſent preſently into Scotland to demand the Cuſtody of the young Queene, and that certaine Scotiſh Noblemen might be appointed to guarde her in England, vntill ſhee came to yeeres of conſent, according to Couenants formerly concluded; which no waies would be granted, and thereupon he prepared an Army thetherward, vnder the Conduct of Lord Edward Seimer Earle of Hertford Lieutenant Generall by Land, accompanied with the Earle of Shrewsbury, and a Fleete of two hundred ſaile by Sea, whereof Sir Iohn Dudley, Vicount Liſle was Admirall.

(124) To the aide of the Scots the Popes holineſſe was very forward, who ſent them the Patriarch of Venice as his Legate, & Orator, to perſwade their Reſolutions, with whom the French King ſent Monſieur la Broche, and Monſieur Menager, to lead them to fight, and fifty thouſand Crownes of the Sun, to ſuſtaine the Charge; with munition worth ten thouſand Crownes more. It ſeemeth by Leſly that part of this ſiluer fell into the Earle Lennox his hand, and that therewith he made head againſt the Gouernor, but not able to match him, ſent vnto King Henry for aide, with proffer of his ſeruice againſt the French ſide, which ſo well was accepted of Henry, as he made him his Nephew, by giuing the Lady Margaret his ſiſters daughter to be his wife.

(125) The Engliſh thus ſeconded with this vnlooked for Allyance, Cardinall Beton thought good to binde all to the Gouernour, who with the Authority of the Queene Dowager proclaimed Lennox an Enemy to the State. But in the meane while the Admirall of England was entred the Frith, and at new Hauen landed his men, where ioining his, to the land Seruice, they altogether marched thence towards Lieth, himſelfe leading the Vaward, Shrewsbury the Rereward, and the Lord Lieutenant the maine Battell. Theſe comming to Lieth, ſpoiled the Town, and thence to Edenbrough, burnt the City, and waſted the Country for ſeauen miles about, this done they ſet fire vpon Haddington, and Dunbarre, and then the whole Army returned vnto Barwicke.

Earle Lennox proclaimed enemie to the ſtate.

The Engliſh enter Scotland.

(126) Whilſt things thus paſſed in Scotland, and the maine purpoſe reſting in ſuſpence, King Henry well knew where the greateſt rub did lie in his way, which was the French King, the chiefeſt Abetter of the Scots, whom he euer vpheld, to hold him tacke at home, leaſt otherwiſe he ſhould tug with France for his owne right. And therefore hauing ioined with the Emperour againſt the French, ſent his Herald, Garter, King at Armes, to demand certaine couenants, which if he refuſed, to proclaime defiance vnto open warres, but he not ſuffered to doe his meſſage to the King, returned, and Henrie prepared an expedition into France, wherein he imploied the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Earles of Arundell, Oxford and Surrey, the Lords, Ruſſell, Grey, Ferrers, Mountioy, and Sainct-Iohn, beſides many other ſeruiceable Knights, and Sir Iohn Dudley appointed high Admirall for the Seas. (127) The Duke of Suffolke in the meane while strucke downe his Standerds on the East side of Bolloigne, and with many sharpe skirmishes, entred the base Towne, which siege King Henry himselfe in person seconded, who hauing passed the Seas from England, vpon the sixe & twentith of Iuly, encamped before Bolloigne on the East-side, whence his Canons so rent the Wals and Bulwarke, as their mounted tops lay vpon the Ground, and his great morter peeces were discharged with so skilfull a Compasse, that their bullets falling downe right, beate all buildings downe vpon the Enemies heads. Whereby (saith Sleidane) in short time he got that, which neither his Father, nor the Kings in former times could neuer winne. For thereupon the Town was surrendred and cleared of the French souldiers, women and children.

(128) The King like a Conquerour with his sword borne before him entred the Gate, where the Duke of Suffolke presented him with the keyes of the Towne, the Trumpets still sounding, and nothing wanting that might applaud his fame. The Towne thus wonne, the English meant still to keep; for the strengthening whereof, the King commanded the faire Church of Saint Maries to be taken downe, and in the same place, a mount to be raised for the planting of Ordinance, to annoy any siege. But being thus busied in Bolloignes affaires, the Emperour without his knowledge or consent came to a peace with the French King, whereat King Henrie was sore displeased, and the sooner left France, leauing Sir Iohn Dudley Lord Lisle, his deputy in Bolloigne, and landed at Douer the first day of October, to his great honor and ioy of his Subiects.

(129) The French King chafed with this late and great losse, sought to trie fortune in further attempts, and that not onely for the recouery of Bolloigne (which with twenty thousand well appointed hee assaied) but also in assayling the English dominions, as the Ile of Wight and those parts of Sussex that lay vpon the Seas, though with losse of many Captaines and thousands of Souldiers, that neuer returned to tell him what intertainement they had; as likewise in sending aide vnto Scotland, where Monsieur Mungumry of the Order of France, with 5000 strong, entred to maintaine the breach betwixt them and K. Henry, which was so followed on both parts, as the English making a Roade towards Gedworth, got praise for their valour, but reproch for their spoiles, and the Scots renowne for killing the Lord Eure, Lord warden of the East-Marches, with many other Captaines in defence of their Countrey.

(130) Hereupon an Army of twelue thousand strong was sent into Scotland, whereof the Earle of Hertford was Generall: with these he forraged the Borders before him, and burnt many Townes in the Middle-Marches, with Kelsey & Coldingham Abbey, the French not hastie to stay the incursion, lay still, and let them (vnfought with) depart for England.

(131) But the warres remoued againe into France, the Reingraue with a great power came to victuall a Fort built neere vnto Bolloigne; to impeach which, the Earle of Surrey, then Lieutenant of the Towne made forth, but was discomfited in the enterprize, and Sir Edward Poynings Captaine of a Band slaine, with fifteene other Captaines, besides many Officers and Common Souldiers. These Princes wars in these violent proceedings, became very fearfull least they would grow to the Common hurt of Christendome, and therefore many other potentates, whereof the Emperour was first, sollicited these Kings vnto a peace, which the sooner was heard and imbraced, for that they were both of them old, and King Henry diseased in body, Commissioners therefore appointed certaine articles were agreed vpon: the first thereof was, that the French King should pay vnto King Henry, eight hundred thousand Crownes in eight yeeres space, and then to reenter vpon Bolloigne, but in the meane time it to remaine vnder the English; to accomplish which peace Monsieur Danehalt high Admirall of France, was sent into England; and Sir Thomas Cheyne Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, to be the Kings Agent at the Font, for the Baptisme of the Dolphins new borne daughter.

(132) Notwithstanding these Complements, the sight of Bolloigne was a great sore in the French mens eies, insomuch that Monsieur Chatillon Captain of Mountplaisier, beganne to make a new Bastilion neere vnto the Towne, euen in the very mouth of the Riuer, which the Lord Grey of Wilton perceiuing certified the King, what inconuenience would happen if that were made strong; and the same discussed at the Counsell-Table, it passed with one voice that the Peace with France was not to be infringed, notwithstanding this French attempt: to which end a prohibition drawne, whereunto King Henry also set his hand, that no let should be made against Chatillon in his Fort. Howbeit the King commanded Sir Thomas Palmer (imploied in this busines) to bid the Lord Grey to impeach the new worke, and to flat so much as was raised thereof vnto the Earth. This commission read with the report of Command to the Contrary, the Counsell of State, thought it most meete to follow their instructions in writing, least the words might either be mis-deliuered or mistaken. But the Lord Grey causing the messengers words to be writ, and subscribed with all their hands that were present at the report, suddainely and vnlooked for, came to the Fort, and in foure houres space cast downe, what had beene in raising three moneths before, which when the King heard off, he asked his Counsellors what they thought of this, that Chatillon-garden was cast downe: amongst whom one of them answered, the doer thereof was worthy to loose his head, I had rather (said the King) loose a dozen of such heades as thine is, then his that had done the deed, and immediately sent the Lord Grey his pardon with many great thankes.

(133) But now the date of his time almost run, and he preparing towards the way of all flesh, the great and faire Church of the Gray Friers London, lately suppressed by himselfe, he caused againe to be opened, and to be made a Parish Church, giuing the reuenewes thereof vnto the Citie of London towards the reliefe of their poore, whereunto he gaue fiue hundred Markes yeerely of Lands for euer to maintaine Gods diuine seruice and the said Churches reparations, within whose walles we finde this often written, This is Christs Church founded by King Henrie the eight.

(134) And his sicknes increasing to the great danger of life hee prepared himselfe to make his Wil, wherein howsoeuer titles had been vnhabled in Parliaments, he ordained his three children to succeede each after others, for want of other Issue; One thousand markes he commanded to be giuen to the poore, and to twelue poore Knights at Winsore each of them twelue pence a day for euer, euery yeere a long Gowne of white cloth, the Garter imbroidered vpon the breast, wherein was placed the Crosse of Saint George, and a Mantle of red cloth to bee worne thereupon, ordaining for his Executors in the minority of Prince Edward, these heere vnder named.

1 Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury.
2 Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor.

And in great penitency for his ſinnes, died vpon Thurſday the twenty eight day of Ianuary, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. when hee had raigned thirty ſeuen yeere, nine moneths, and fiue daies, &had liued fifty fiue yeres, fiue months, & fiue daies, whoſe body with great ſolemnity was buried at Windſore vnder a moſt coſtly and ſtately Tombe begunne in Copper and guilt, but neuer finiſhed, in the incloſures of whoſe Grates is curiouſly caſt this inſcription. HENRICVS OCTAVVS REX ANGLIAE, FRANCIAE, DOMINVS HIBERNIAE, FIDEI DEFENSOR with what coſt and ſtate this his Monument was intended, is manifeſted by a Manuſcript taken from the true modell thereof, which I receiued from that induſtrious Herauld, Maſter Nicholas Charles Lancaſter, and for the great magnificence is worthy heere to be inſerted.

(135) This magnificent Monarch was of presence Maiesticall, and of Personage more then ordinarily tal, faire of Complexion and Corpulent of body, very wise and very well learned, of a sudden and ready speach, in youth very prodigall, and in his age very liberall, pleasant and affable, but not to be dallyed with, bolde in attempting, and euer thirstie of potent glory: an expert Souldier, and fauouring such as were actiue or seruiceable, according to the then vsuall saying, King Henrie loues a man: and indeed somewhat too wel the delights with women, as by his many wiues heere ensuing, may well appeare,

His Wiues.

(136) Katherine the first wife to King Henry was the daughter of Ferdinando the sixt King of Spaine, and widow dowager of Prince Arthur his elder brother, as hath beene said: she was married vnto this King the third of Iune 1509. and first of his Raigne, the yeere of saluation 1509. being solemnely crowned with him vpon the twenty fourth day of the same, and was his wife aboue twenty yeeres, and then diuorced from him by the sentence of the Archbishop of Canterbury: liued three yeeres after by the name of Katherine Dowager. Shee deceased at Kimbolton in the County of Huntington the eight of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ 1535. and lieth interred on the North-side of the quire in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow vnder a hearse of Blacke Saye, hauing a white Crosse in the middest. A.D. 1533

(137) Anne, the second wife of King Henry, was the second daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen, Earle of Wiltshire and Ormond. Shee was solemnly at Windsore created Marchioness of Pembrooke, the first of September and twenty foure of his Raigne, hauing one thousand pound giuen her by yeere, to maintaine her estate. Shee was married vnto king Henry in his Closet at White-Hall, vpon the twenty fift day of Ianuary, and yeere of Christ Iesus, 1533. being the foure and twentith of his Raigne, and was Crowned with all due obseruances, at Westminster vpon Whitsunday the first of Iune, where the Crowne of Saint Edward was set vpon her head, the scepter of Gould deliuered into her right hand, and the Iuory rodde with the Doue into her left. Shee was his wife three yeeres, three monthes and twenty fiue daies, when being cut off by the sword the nineteenth of May, her body was buried in the Quire of the Chappell in the Tower, leauing her accused fame to bee censured as affections best pleased the vncharitable minded, and her bed to bee possest of a vertuous Lady. A.D. 1532. A.D. 1536.

(138) Iane, the third wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Iohn Seimer Knight, and sister to Lord Edward Seimer, Earle of Hertford, and Duke of Sommerset. Shee was married vnto him the twentieth of May, euen the next day after the beheading of Queene Anne, and the twenty eight of his Raigne. Shee was his wife one yeere, fiue monthes and twenty foure daies, and died in Child-bed the foureteenth of October, to the great griefe of the King, who not onely remoued from the place, but kept himselfe priuate, and wore the Garment of mourning euen in the Festiuall time of Christmas, her body was solemnely conueied to Windsore the eight of Nouember following, where she was interred in the middest of the Quire of the Church within the Castell.

(139) Anne the fourth wife of King Henry and sister to William Duke of Cleue was married vnto him the sixth of Ianuary in the thirty one yeere of his Raigne, the yeere of Grace, 1540. shee was his wife sixe moneths, after which time certaine Lords of the vpper House of Parliament came into the nether, and alleaged cause for which that marriage was vnlawfull, whereunpon shee was diuorced, and by Statute enacted, that shee should no more be taken for Queene, but should be called the Lady Anne of Cleue. See remained in England long after the Kings death, though small mention is made of her by any of our Writers, only we finde that she accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London at the solemnizing of Queene Maries Coronation. A.D. 1540.

(140) Katherine the fifth wife of King Henry the eight, was the daughter of Edmund, and Neece vnto Thomas Howard his brother, Duke of Norfolke: Shee was married vnto him the eight of August and yeere of Grace 1540. being the thirtie two of his Raigne, at Hampton Court, and continued his Queene the space of one yeere, sixe moneths and foure daies, and for her vnchaste life was attainted by Parliament, and for the same beheaded within the Tower of London the twelfth of February and her body buried in the Chauncell of the Chappell by Queene Anne Bullen.

(141) Katherine the sixth and last wife of King Henry was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall and sister to Lord William Parre Marquesse of Northampton, shee was first married to Iohn Neuill, Lord Latimer, and after his decease, vpon the twelfth of Iuly maried vnto the King at Hampton Court, the yeere of Saluation, 1543. and thirtie fiue of his Raigne: Shee was his wife three yeeres, sixe months and fiue daies, and suruiuing him, was againe married vnto Thomas Seimer Lord Admirall of England, vnto whom she bare a daughter, but died in the same Child-bed, the yeere of Grace, 1548.

His Issue.

(142) Henrie the first sonne of King Henry by Queene Katherine his first wife, was borne at Richmund in Surrey vpon the first of Ianuary, and the first of

of his fathers Raigne, whose Godfathers at Font were the Lord Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterburie, and the Earle of Surrey: his Godmother, Lady Katherine Countesse of Deuonshire, daughter to King Edward the fourth. This Prince liued not fully two months but died in the same place wherein he was borne, vpon the two and twentieth of February, and his body with all due obsequies buried in Westminster.

(143) A sonne not named was borne vnto King Henrie by Lady Katherine his first Queene in the month of Nouember, and the sixth yeere of his Raigne, who liued not long, and therefore no further mention of him can bee made: the deathes of these Princes King Henrie tooke as a punishment from God, for so he alleaged it in the publike Court held in Blacke-friers London, they being begot on his owne brothers wife.

(144) Marie the third childe and first daughter of King Henrie by Queene Katherine his first wife, was born at Greenewich in Kent, the eighteenth of Februarie in the yeere of Christs humanity, 1518. and the eighth of his Raigne. Shee was by the direction of her mother brought vp in her Childe-hood by the Countesse of Salisbury her neere kinswoman, for that as some thought, the Queene wished a marriage betwixt some of her sons and the Princesse, to strengthen her Title by that Aliance into Yorke, if the King should die without issue Male. In her yong yeeres shee was sued to be married with the Emperour, the King of Scots, and the Duke of Orleance in France, but all these failing, and shee succeeding her brother K Edward in the Crowne, at the age of thirtie sixe yeeres, matched with Phillip King of Spaine, to the great dislike of many, and small content to her selfe, hee being imploied for the most part beyond the Seas, for griefe whereof and the losse of Calice, shee lastly fell into a burning feauer, that cost her her life.

Holinsh. p.883.

(145) Elizabeth the second daughter of King Henrie, and first childe by Queene Anne his second wife, was borne at Greenwich, vpon Sunday the seuenth of September, the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1534 and twenty fiue of her Fathers Raigne, who with due solemnities was baptized the Wednesday following, Archbishop Cranmer, the old Dutches of Norfolke, and the old Marchioness of Dorset being the witnesses at the Font, and the Marchioness of Exeester at the confirmation: Shee succeeded her sister Queene Marie in the Monarchy of England, and was for wisdome, vertue, piety, and Iustice, not onelie the Mirrour of her Sexe, but a patterne for Gouernment to al the princes in Christendome: whose name I may not mention without al dutiful remembrance, and whose memory vnto me is most deare, amongst the many thousands that receiued extraordinary fauours at her gracious and most liberall hand.

(146) Another man-childe Queene Anne bare vnto King Henry, though without life vpon the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, and twenty seuen of his Raigne, to the no little griefe of the mother, some dislike of the King, as the sequel of her accusation and death did shortly confirme.

John Stow.

(147) Edward the last childe of King Henry, and first of Queene Iane his third wife, was borne at Hampton Court, the twelfth of October, the yeere of Grace, 1537. and twenty nine of the Kings Raigne, being cut out of his mothers wombe as is constantly affirmed, like as Iulius Cæsar is said to haue been: his Godfathers at the Font, was Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Norfolk, his sister Lady Mary being Godmother, saith Grafton: Sixe daies after his birth he was created Prince of Wales, and at the death of his Father, succeeded him in all his Dominions, of whom more followeth heereafter.

His Naturall Issue.

(148) Henrie Fitz-Roie the naturall sonne of King Henrie the eight was begotten of the Lady Talboise called Elizabeth Blunt, and borne in the Mannor of Blackamoore in Essex about the tenth yeere of his Raigne; at the age of sixe yeeres he was created Earle of Nottingham and in the fiue and twentieth of his Fathers Raigne vpon the eighteenth of Iune in the Kings Pallace of Bridewell was made Duke of Richmond and Sommerset, Lord Warden of the East, West, and Middle-Marches against Scotland, and Lieutenant Generall of all the parts of England Northward, he was a Prince very forward in Marshal Actiuities, of Good literature and knowledge in the tongues, vnto whom the learned Antiquary Leland dedicated a Booke; He married Marie daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, Earle Marshall and Lord high Treasurer of England, with whom he liued not long, but died at Saint Iames by Westminster the two and twentieth of Iuly in the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1536. and was buried at Framingham in Suffolke.

Thomas Mile. Holinshed Stow. Thetford in Norfolke. p.1137.

THe tempestuous stormes in the Raigne of this King Henrie the eight, and the violent deluge raised against the Church-state of his times; bare downe so many religious strong foundations, and were the destruction of so many beautifull Monasteries, as the onely relation of their numbers and names, would haue much interrupted the narration of his history. Wherefore to reteine their memorials (though their walles are laid waste) aswell for the reuerence we owe vnto venerable Antiquity, as for the example of their Founders holy zeale, we haue inserted a Catalogue of their names, orders, and true valuations, as in the originall Booke thereof taken by Commission, and giuen vnto the King, we finde them downe, though at their dissolutions their values were fauourably and farre vnder rated. Some Founders, and times of foundations wee want, the rest, Tablewise, to auoid prolixity wee haue set downe in this present following

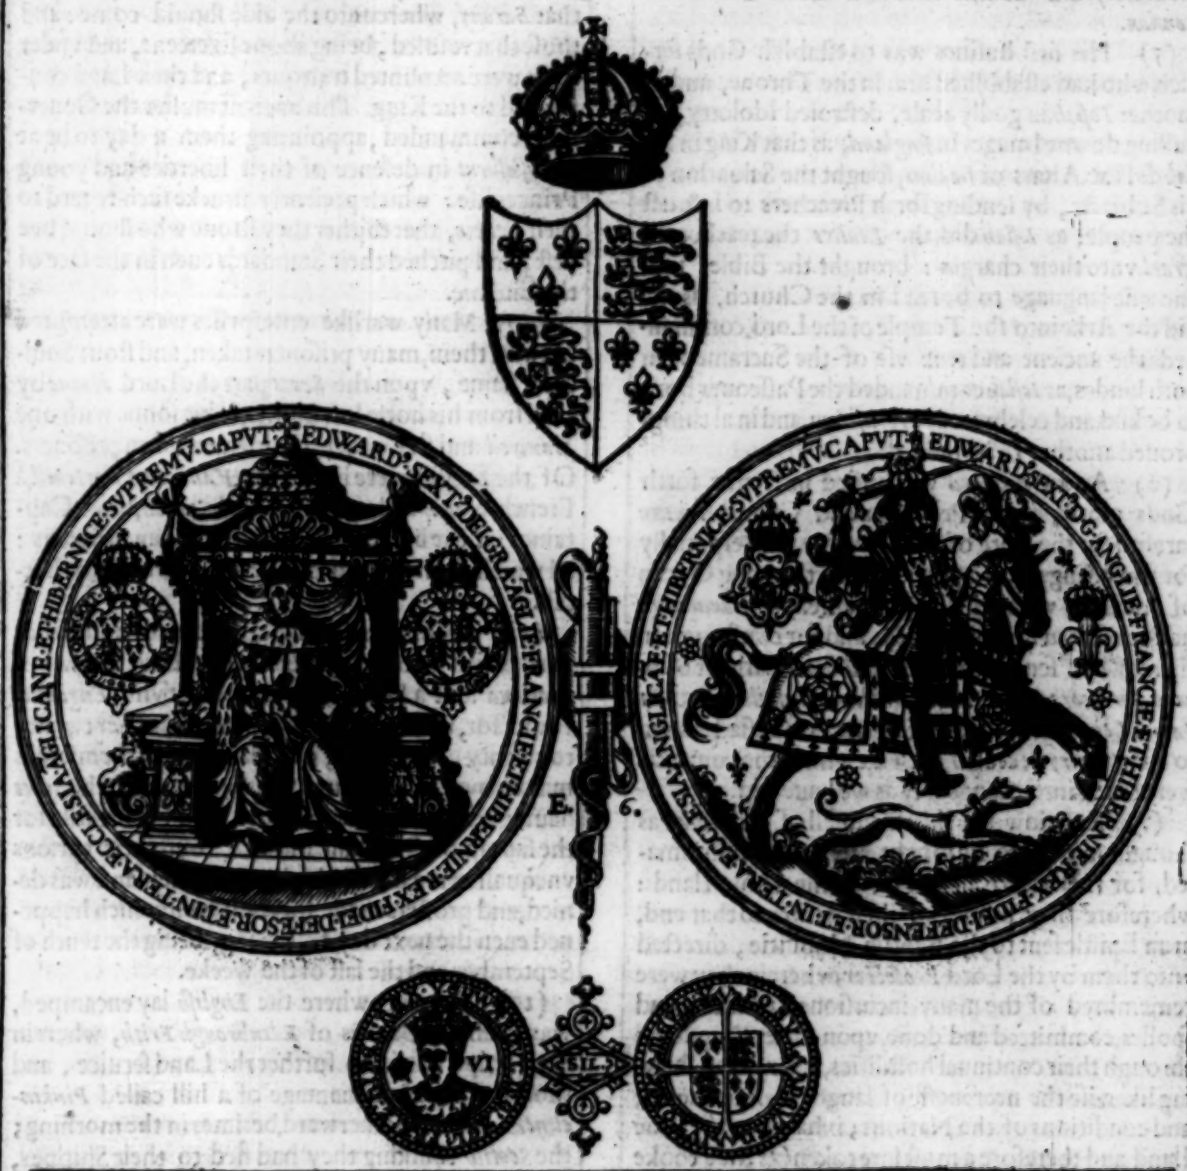
EDVVARD

Edward VI.

EDVVARD THE SIXT OF THAT NAME, KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE FIFTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS LIFE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

Monarch 59



CHAPTER XXII.

EDWARD the sixt of that Name, and onely sonne liuing vnto King Henry the eight, was borne at his Mannor of Hampton-Court in Middlesex, the twelfth of October, and yeere of saluation, 1537. and sixe dayes after being the eighteenth of the same moneth, hee was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chester: his birth was ioyfull vnto the King and Commons; but the death of his mother, the vertuous Queen Iane, brought immediat sorow vnto both, whose womb was cut (as some haue affirmed) to the sauing of his, but losse of her owne life, vpon whose death these elegant verses were writ;

A.D. 1547.

Phœnix Iana iacet nato Phœnice, dolendum
Sæcula Phœnices nulla tulisse duas.

Here lies the Phœnix Lady Iane, whose death a Phœnix bare,
O griefe, two Phœnixs at one time, together neuer were.

(2) Nine yeeres and od monethes hee was vertuously trained vp in the life of his father, and at his death appointed the first of his heires, and for want of Issue (if it so chanced) Mary, and shee failing, Elizabeth to succeed in his throne. for as Henry with Salomon was blame-worthy for women, so left hee but one sonne and two daughters, as the other in Scripture is said to haue done: Salomon had Rehoboam a foole and vnfortunate, his daughters, but obscure, and both of them Subiects; but Henry was more happy in Edward his ſonne, who proued another young Salomon himſelfe, and his ſiſters both Soueraignes of an Imperiall Crowne.

A.D. 1546.

(3) He beganne his raigne the twenty eight of Ianuary, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1546. and the laſt of that moneth was proclaimed King of England, France and Ireland, Defendor of the Faith; and ſupreme Gouernour of theſe Churches, with other his rightfull Titles to his Imperiall Stiles belonging. And on the twentith of February following being Shroue-Sunday, was Crowned at Weſtminſter with all due Solemnities.

Iohn Stow.

The Duke of Hertford made Protector by Parliament.

(4) His Counſellors were appointed by his ſicke Father as we haue ſaid, and Protector ouer his Minoritie and Realmes (by conſent of the Nobles) was ordained his Vncle Edward Lord Seymer Earle of Hereford and Duke of Sommerſet, brother vnto Queene Iane, who thereupon gaue the young King the Order of Knight-hood, and the King immediately did the like vnto the Lord Maior of London.

2. Chron. 34.

(5) His firſt buſines was to eſtabliſh Gods ſeruice, who had eſtabliſhed him in the Throne, and as another Ioſiah in godly zeale, deſtroied Idolatry, by pulling downe Images in England, as that King in Iudah did the Altars of Baalim, ſought the Saluation of his Subiects, by ſending forth Preachers to inſtruct the people, as Ioſiah did the Leuites the teachers of Iſrael vnto their charges: brought the Bible in a knowne language to be read in the Church, as he did the Arke into the Temple of the Lord, commanded the ancient and true vſe of the Sacrament in both kindes, as Ioſiah commanded the Paſſeouer both to be kild and celebrated in Ieruſalem, and in al things proued another Ioſiah indeed.

Ioſiah and King Edward compared. 2. Chron. 35.

Statutes Ed. 6. An. 1.

(6) And as Edward was buſied in ſetting forth Gods glorie, ſo the Protector and Councell were carefull for the State of the Realme, and eſpecially for their Kings marriage with Mary the yong Queen of Scotland, vnto which a Parliament at Edenburgh had conſented in Anno 1543. and for confirmation thereof had ſent into England, William Earle of Glancarn, Sir George Dowglas, Sir William Hamilton, and Sir Iames Leirmound, Scotiſh Knights, Ambaſſadors, vnto King Henry deceaſed, betwixt whom the contracts were ſealed interchangeably as we haue ſaid.

The Engliſh deſire the marriage with Scotland.

(7) And now by the Counſell of England was thought moſt fit to be ſought after, and conſummated, for the wealth and peace of the whole Iland: wherefore they publiſhed their deſires to that end, in an Epiſtle ſent to the Scotiſh Nobilitie, directed vnto them by the Lord Protector; wherein they were remembred of the many incurſions, roades, and ſpoiles, committed and done, vpon either Kingdome through their continual hoſtilities, and warres: ſhewing likewiſe the neereneſſe of language, lineaments, and conditions of the Nations; inhabiting the ſame Iland, and therefore a moſt ſure token (as they tooke it) to be deſcended from one and the ſame Originall; vrging Gods prouidence, that had taken away all the Male-Princes of Scotland, leauing them only one daughter; and in England, onely one ſonne vnto King Henry among his many wiues. Their Princes themſelues for yeeres, qualities, and magnificence, fitly ordained to contract the vnion of Peace: alleaging that England ſought neither the preheminēce nor the cōqueſt of Scotland, but rather deſired an equality both in ſtate and gouernment; and to that end offred to take the name of Britaines indifferent to both, though diſhonorable to themſelues, in bereauing their Nation of the glorie atchieued, in many of their victories. Theſe notwithſtanding, the Scotiſh perſiſted to beſtow their young Queene another way.

(8) Whereupon the Protector in perſon, vndertooke an expedition into Scotland, accompanied with the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Dacres, and Grey of Wilton, many Knights, and a moſt warlike army of Souldiers. Edward Lord Clinton Admirall of the Fleete was appointed to Sea, and Sir William Woodhouſe made his Vice-admirall: theſe meeting at Berwiche ſet forth into Scotland, declaring by ſound of Trumpet the cauſe of their comming, with proffers of peace to all ſuch of that Nation, as would aduance the marriage betwixt their two Princes, according to Couenants already concluded vpon.

The Engliſh made Proclamation in Scotland.

(9) The Gouernour of Scotland hearing newes of many Caſtles ſurrender and ſurpriſe, and feares daily encreaſing by augmented reports, commanded his Herauldes with all poſſible diligence, to paſſe through all the parts of the Realme, and the fire Croſſe to be borne whereſoeuer they came, a Cuſtome indeed anciently vſed in greateſt extremity, and onely then after this manner, two fire Brands ſet a Croſſe were carried vpon the point of a ſpeare, with Proclamation of the eminent danger, calling for aide, aſſigning the time and place, when and whither they were to reſort: yet there be that ſay, It was a painted red Croſſe ſet vp for certaine daies in the Field of that Barony, whereunto the aide ſhould come: and thoſe that refuſed, being aboue ſixeteene, and vnder ſixty were accounted traitours, and their Land confiſcated to the King. This ancient muſter the Gouernour commanded, appointing them a day to be at * Muſſilburt in defence of their liberties and young Princes life: which preſently ſtrucke ſuch regard to their hearts, that thither they ſtroue who ſhould bee firſt, and pitched their Standards euen in the face of the Enemie.

(10) Many warlike enterpriſes were attempted betwixt them, many priſoners taken, and ſtout Souldiers ſlaine, vpon the Scots part the Lord Hume by a fall from his horſe loſt his life, & his ſonne with one Maxwell and ſixe other Gentlemen taken priſoners. Of the Engliſh were hurt Henry Vane, and Barteuill, a French-man: Bulmer, Gower, and Crouch, three Captaines of the light horſemen were taken priſoners: all which ſo happened before the day of great Battell.

Enterpriſes done before the great battell was fought.

(11) Whilſt theſe things proceeded, and either part plaied vpon the aduantage, Earle Huntly of Scotland ſent a Herauld and Trumpet vnto Englands Protector, with proffers of Combate, either twenty to twenty, ten to ten, or in ſingle fight themſelues man to man, which ſurely was honorable, the Scots hauing aduantage for number, and Charitable for the ſauing of Chriſtian blood: but their perſons vnequall in regard of his place; that demand was denied, and proffers made for the battell: which happened euen the next day following, being the tenth of September and the laſt of the weeke.

Eare Huntlyis ſtout challenge.

(12) The place where the Engliſh lay encamped, was vpon the Bankes of Edenbrough Frith, wherein their Ships floted to further the Land ſeruice, and thoſe ſeeking the aduantage of a hill called Pinkincleuche, haſted thetherward betimes in the morning; the Scotiſh thinking they had fled to their Shippes, made the like haſt to impeach their March, their Armie they diuided into three Battels, the Vantgard whereof was led by the Earle of Angus, the reregard by the valiant Earle Huntley, and in the great Battell, was the Gouernour with the Earle of Argile, and many other of the Scotiſh Nobility.

(13) Theſe eager of ſpoile, and filled with hope, haſted furiouſly forward, without all feare or any good Order, and breath-leſſe, almoſt paſſed ouer the Riuer Eſke, preuenting thereby the expectation of the enemy, but being within danger of ſhot, the Engliſh Fleete from the Roade let freely fly among a wing of the Iriſh-Archers, ſlaying many, with ſuch terror to the reſt, as hardly could they be gotten for to goe forward, which indangered them more. The Scotiſh Armie thereupon remoued ſomewhat South-ward, ſeeking to get the higher ground with aduantage both of Sunne and winde, the deſire whereof cauſed them little to regard the helpe of horſe, but for haſte drew their great Ordinance thetherward only by maine ſtrength of men.

A wing of the Iriſh ſore galled from the Ile.

(14) The

(14) The English Captaines perceiuing what the Scotish intended, and that now no skirmish but a Battell must be vndergone fell to Consultation, being mounted in their sadles, where with such resolutions they departed asunder, that Iohn Earle of Warwicke, Lord Marshall of the field, desired the Protector to be good vnto his wife and Children, if on his part things went not well with him. By this time the Armies were at point to ioine battel, in the place called Edmondstone-edge neere vnto Muskelburough, where the Master of the English Ordinance had mounted two Canons neere vnto the top of the hill. The Scotish came forward, faster then an ordinary Marche, their pikemen thicke ranged together, bearing broad Bucklers in their left hands.

(15) At the first encounter Captain Shelley Lieutenant of the band of Bulleners: Captaine Ratliffe brother to the Lord Fitzwater, with many Gentlemen of name and account, were slaine, and the Lord Grey of Wilton General of the Horsemen, dangerously hurt in the mouth with a Pike: and indeed such was the fury of the Scots first encounter, that the English horsemen were forced backe, and in retiring ranne through, and bare downe a part of their owne foote-men, to their great hurt: when their Kings Standard (borne by Sir Andrew Flammoch) was laid fast hold on by the Scotish, and had not that Knights strength beene the more, and his horse the better, himselfe had beene slaine, and the Standard lost, which notwithstanding was grasped so fast, that the Scots bare away the Nether end of the staffe to the burrell.

(16) The Canons from the hill, plaied sore vpon the Scotish, and so did the Ordinance out of the English Fleete, whose terrible noise and smoake, filled the Armies with furious Cries, and darkened the day as with the Clouds of night: The retreat of the Protectors Horsemen, disordering their fellowes (as is said) gaue signes vnto the Scots of a present victory, who now vpon a forward Courage disranked themselues for hast, and fell vpon the disbanded English, who presently by their leaders were brought into Array, and fiercely pressed forward vpon the vantgard of the enemie, their aduantage the more, for that the Scots wanted shot to answere their violence; which caused them in hast confusedly to retire towards their great Battell; and those misdeeming the day had beene lost, turned their backes and fled; the chase was followed almost fiue miles, wherein the Lord Fleming with sundry men of note were slaine: Bishop Leslie recordeth nine by name, besides ten thousand of their souldiers that therein lost their liues, and prisoners taken, about a thousand persons, the chiefe whereof was the Earle of Huntly, Chancellour of Scotland, the Lord Yester, Hobby, Hamilton Captaine of Dunbarre, the Master of Sanpoole, the Lord Wimmes and a brother of the Earle of Cassils: such was the successe of the English, and losse of the Scotish.

(17) Lieth they sacked and set on fire, tooke the Iland Saint Colmes, Broughtierag, Rockesburgh, Humes Castle, and others: so that many Gentlemen in Tiuidall, and the Meres, came to the Protector and entred into termes and conditions of Peace. In the meane while by the working of the Gouernour, and Queene Dowager, the young Queene was suddainely conueyed from Striueling, vnto the Ile, and Abbay of Michmahome, as to a place of more security, and shortly after into France to be married vnto the Dolphine, shee then being of age betwixt fiue and sixe: whereat the English so stormed, as they determined and threatned the Conquest of Scotland. But God who is the disposer of Kingdomes, and hath the hearts of Princes in his owne hand, in his vnsearchable decrees, saw it not time to vnite as yet, the whole Iland vnder one Crowne, to which end he suffered the French to assist the Scots, and England to be burthened with her owne ciuill broyles.

(18) For the Protector returned, and a Parliament at London assembled, all Colledges, Free-Chappels, and Chanteries, were giuen to the King, wherein was repealed the Statute formerly made, and commonly called the fiue articles, which had beene the cause of many Martyrs deathes, in the daies of King Henry his Father, as also other enacted by King Richard the second, and Henry the fift, for the suppression of Scriptures in English, and other points held, in their daies accounted hereticall, at which time also iniunctions went forth to cleanse the Church of all Images, and Commissioners sent with authority to pull them downe, who first began at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in London, and thence proceeded casting downe those Idols, in all the Churches throughout England and Wales. Whereof great stirres presently happened and in Cornwall the first.

(19) For the Kings Commission being put in practise, and these gay golden Images cast downe, broken and burnt, their Priests accounted the Act sacrilegious, and one of them as Baals for zeale, sought to make his sacrifice with blood, but sparing his owne, sheathed his knife in the heart of Master Body a Commissioner, imploied about the same busines: which fact was so fauoured among the rurall Commons of Cornwall, and Deuonshire (who euer gaue voice for the papall continuance) that in a rebellious manner they combined together against the King.

(20) Their chiefe Captaines were Humfrey Arundell, Gouernour of the Mount, with sixe other Gentlemen of name, neither were the Priests backeward in so bad a worke, whereof Robert Bocham, and seauen others were the forwardest men; accompanied with no lesse then ten thousand tall Souldiers, who all sought to vndoe those points of religion, which the King by law and act of Parliament had ordained to be obserued: Whereupon they besieged the City of Excester, and with many sharpe assaults sought the possession thereof, twise firing the Gates, and leauing nothing vndone that either wit or warre would afford to obtaine: for they brought the Citizens to such distresse that they forced them to mould vp branne for their bread, working it in Cloathes, for otherwise could they not bring it to incorporate together: their daintiest flesh was their owne horses, and those slaine were distributed aswell to the poore as rich; for which their loyalty and most faithfull seruice King Edward did both highly esteeme them, and richly reward them by confirmation of the Cities Charters, inlarging the liberties, augmenting the reuenewes and giuing vnto the Citizens the manor of Exciland, as the signet of his loue for their seruice to the Crowne, to be had in remembrance of their loialty for euer. Meane while the Rebels robbed the Countrey, vnto whom all things was common that came vnto hand.

(21) The Rebels thus pestering those parts with their riotous attempts, looked and well hoped that others would haue ioined to their aide, but therein deceiued, they lastly fell to Consultation what was to be done, and in fine concluded for the best pollicy to article with the King, which how to be set downe, bred likewise much trouble and disturbance with their confused cries: for these rude and vnexperienced Counsellors made their owne conceiued opinions the fundamentall matters for redresse, some would haue this, and other some that; but none would be gainesaid of his will or demand, holding his voice as worthy of hearing in this Court of assembly, as his body an aide to support the Action, so that long it was ere they could light on their owne discontents, and longer ere they could agree what they would haue reformed, onely still constant in variable vnconstancy, for some would haue no Iustices, others no Gentlemen, Parkes must be Pastures, and Inclosures must downe, the Priests euer pulling the Bell rope toring the Masse into England, and to cowll Cardinall Poole from Rome; and with much

(22) Foraſmuch as man, except he be borne of Water and the holy Ghoſt, cannot enter into the kingdome of God, and foraſmuch as the gates of Heauen bee not open without this bleſſed Sacrament of Baptiſme, therefore we will that our Curates ſhall miniſter this Sacrament at all times of need aſwell in the weeke daies, as on the holy daies.

Conſecration of the Lords body. Holinſhed.

Item foraſmuch as we conſtantly beleeue that after the Prieſt hath ſpoken the words of Conſecration being at Maſſe, there celebrating and conſecrating the ſame, there is very really the Body and Blood of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt God and Man, and that no ſubſtance of Bread and Wine remaineth after, but the very ſame Body that was borne of the Virgine Mary, and was giuen vpon the Croſſe for our Redemption: therefore we will haue Maſſe celebrated as it hath beene in times paſt, without any man communicating with the Prieſts, foraſmuch as many rudely preſuming vnworthily to receiue the ſame put no difference betweene the Lords body and other kind of meate; ſome ſaying that it is bread before and after: ſome ſaying that it is profitable to no man except hee receiue it, with many other abuſed termes.

Item we will that our Prieſts ſhall ſing and ſay with an audible voice, Gods ſeruice in the Quier of the Pariſh Churches, and not Gods ſeruice to be ſet forth like a Chriſtmaſſe play.

Item for aſmuch as Prieſts be men dedicated to God, for miniſtring and celebrating the bleſſed Sacrament, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they ſhall liue chaſt without marriage, as Saint Paul did, being the elect and choſen veſſell of God: ſaying vnto all honeſt Prieſts, beyee followers of mee.

The Kings anſwere and generall pardon.

(23) To theſe their Demands the King ſent this anſwere, therein pittying their ignorance, and blaming their folly, and therewithall his Generall pardon, to as many as would deſiſt whiles it was time. Firſt he reproued them, for their preſumptions, thus contumeliouſly to riſe againſt their dread Soueraigne, to the diſturbance of his loyall Subiects peace; whoſe ſimplicity they had notoriouſly abuſed, in vſing his name to draw them into action of Rebellion: and no leſſe likewiſe in the grounds of their demands. As in their firſt Article for Baptiſme, where it was well knowne the ſame was admitted as neceſſity required, or rather commanded by the Booke of Common praier, publiſhed by authority of Parliament, and as themſelues knew in preſent practiſe. But touching the Sacrament in their ſecond Article, how impudently they did belie the true receiuers thereof, was manifeſt, who make ſo much difference in that holy adminiſtration, that they accoune no profit in Common bread, beſides the nouriſhment of their naturall Bodies: but this bleſſed bread to be the food of their ſoules vnto eternall life. And as you are ſeduced in theſe (ſaith the admonition) ſo in confirmation alſo they carrie your ſimplicities captiue, for the truth teacheth no otherwiſe then themſelues beleeue, namely, that a Child baptized, and dying before confirmation is nethelesſe in ſtate of Grace, elſe are themſelues cauſers of their childrens damnation: ſo the ſeruice of God brought from an vnknowne tongue, cannot ſurely offend any reaſonable man, which is onely to make him vnderſtand that, which before he knew not, and to giue his conſent to thoſe prayers, whereof he hath moſt need, and giueth the neereſt touch to his owne feeling conſcience, for God requireth the heart onely which with an vnderſtanding ſeruice, we muſt ſacrifice vnto him. But moſt of all (ſaith this good King) we maruell at your demand, for the ſixe Articles reſtored, to haue them in power as formerly hath beene. Doe you know what you aske, or in obtaining doe you know what you get? They were lawes indeed lately made, but quickly repented; too cruell for you, and too mercileſſe for vs; who would haue our Raigne written with milke, and not with blood, and becauſe they were bloody, we took them away, with the ſame authority, by which they were made; leaſt retaining them, our ſword ſhould be too often drawne, and rigour extended vpon our true and well-deſeruing ſubiects. We for our parts ſeeke no longer to liue, then to be a father vnto our people, and as God hath made vs your rightfull King, ſo hath he commanded you vnto obedience: by whoſe great Maieſtie we ſweare, you ſhall feele the power of the ſame God in our ſword, which how mighty it is, no ſubiect knoweth: how puiſſant it is no priuate man can iudge, and how mortall no Engliſh heart can thinke: therefore embrace our mercy while it is offered, leaſt the blood ſpilt by your meanes cry vengeance from the Earth, and be heard in the eares of the Lord in Heauen.

(24) All this notwithſtanding, the Rebels perſiſted in their traiterous attempts: againſt whoſe ſeditions Sir Iohn Ruſſell Lord Priuy Seale, was appointed Generall of the Kings Army; vnto whoſe aſſiſtance was ioined the Lord Grey of Wilton, vnder whom ſerued a band of Italians intended againſt Scotland, theſe lay at Briſtow attending the comming of the Lord Generall: who now was marched Weſtward to Honiton, where daily looking for more ſupply, thoſe which he had, began to ſhrinke away, whereby the Rebels were emboldned to make towards him, and came as far as Fenington-bridge within three Miles of Honiton, and in a faire Meadow there ſpread their Colours. The Lord Ruſſell though weake in compariſon of them, holding it more honour to aſſaile then to be aſſaulted, made forward euen vnto the Bridge: at whoſe ſight the Enemies prepared themſelues to fight, and with a ſtrong guard maintained the Bridge, beſides which there was paſſage ouer the Riuer, that held his courſe betwixt the two Armies.

Iohn Hooker in deſcription of Exceſter.

The rebels make toward the Lord generall.

(25) Great were the attempts the Lord Lieutenant gaue, and manfull was the reſiſtance that the Rebell made, yet laſtly the way was wonne, and followed vnto the battell of the diſloyals: where preſently beganne a moſt cruell fight, and a while was maintained to the loſſe of their blood, but the falſe hearts failing, and the true ſubiects courage increaſing, the Corniſh immediately gaue backe and fled, whereat the Kings ſouldiers out of Order fell to the ſpoile, minding nothing leſſe then that which preſently enſued, for the Corniſhmen perceiuing their diſordered carriage, ſuddainely returned, and began a new fight, when the Lord Ruſſell likewiſe ordered a new his Army: theſe furiouſly ioining, a ſharpe and cruell encounter enſued, with the loſſe of much blood, and the liues of three hundred Rebels, who laſtly tooke to their heeles and left the field: the chaſe a while followed, and the ſouldiers ſcattered, a fearefull crie ſuddainely aroſe, that all the Commons were vp, which cauſed the Lord Generall to returne vnto Honiton: whether ſhortly came the Lord Grey of Wilton, hauing in pay Spiniola an Italian Captaine with three hundred ſhott.

The valiant attempt of the Lord Ruſſell.

The rebels put to flight.

The rebels returne and renew the fight.

And againe put to flight.

(26) The Lord Ruſſels forces augmented, his greateſt care was to releeue the City Exceſter, whither vpon the third of Auguſt he haſted from Honiton being a thouſand ſtrong; and paſſing ouer the Downes toward Woodbury, lodged his Campe that night neere to the Wind-Mill, whereof the Rebels hauing intelligence, raiſed themſelues from Saint

Mary

Mary Clift, and made amaine vnto the Downes, thinking to ſurpriſe the Lord Generall before hee was ready; but hee as vigilant as they were forward, encountred them againe in battell, and againe gaue them the ouerthrow with the loſſe of the moſt of their liues, the reſt eſcaping by flight, got vnto the Towne of Saint Mary Clift.

(27) The newes whereof bruted, and the Papal ſide bruiſed by theſe three ouerthrowes, the Commons in whole troupes reſorted to their aide, and to make all ſure on their ſide (by the preſence and helpe of their conſecrated God) they brought into the field the Crucifixe vnder a Canopy, which in ſtead of an Altar was ſet in a carte, accompanied with Croſſes, and Candleſtickes, Banners, Holy-Bread, and holy-water, both to driue away Diuels, and to dull their enemies ſwords; which notwithſtanding they did not, neither could they deliuer themſelues in the day of deſtruction; for the Towne being fired, and the Armies met vpon Clift heath, a moſt cruell and bloudy battell was fought, wherein was ſlaine the whole rout of the Rebels, & all theſe trinkets caſt in the durt.

(28) The chiefe Captaines were taken and ſent vnto London, who were Humfrey Arundell, Winſland, Holmes and Burie, who there paid the law with the loſſe of their liues. Many others were executed without iudgement, onely by Marſhall Law, as was Boier Maior of Bodmin in Cornwall, vnto whom Sir Anthony Kingſton, Prouoſt Marſhall ſent worde he would viſite him at dinner, but before he was ſet downe, commanded the Maior to cauſe a paire of Gallowes to be ſet vp; & the Table taken away, he willed the ſaid Maior to acompany him to the place, & there preſently commanded Boier his Hoſt to the halter, and ſaw him hanged before he departed.

(29) At the ſame time, and neere the ſame place dwelled a Miller, who had beene a buſie doer in the Rebellion, but hee knowing the danger, willed his man to take the name of the maſter, if any enquired after him; whereupon the ſaid Sir Anthony came to the mill, and calling for the maſter, the man in his name preſented himſelfe, who ſtrait commanded him vnto the Gallowes, the ſeruant then ſeeing the danger of death, confeſſed hee was not the maſter, but the man: well, ſaid the Knight, thou canſt neuer doe thy maſter better ſeruice then to hang for him, and thereupon truſſed him vppe in the next tree.

(30) As theſe things were in acting in the Weſt, ſo other Commotions aroſe in other partes of the Land, though broched vnder another pretence, namely the laying open of incloſures, which the king by Proclamation had commanded to be done, but many offenders bearing themſelues out with greatneſſe, ſlackened the execution, and the poorer preſuming vpon the Kings pleaſure, began to execute his commiſſion themſelues, and thoſe in many places at once, as in Kent, Eſſex, Sommerſet, Buckingham, Northampton and Lincolne ſhires they did.

(31) But moſt dangerous was that in Norfolke, whoſe Inhabitants following the examples of the reſt, held out much longer, and in more violent maner. Their firſt attempt was at Atilborough againſt one Greene that had taken away part of their commons, next at Wimonham, where by the inſtigation of Iohn Flowerdew they caſt downe the fences of Incloſures, belonging to Robert Ket a Tanner in the ſame Towne; who to bee euen with Flowerdew brought them to Hetherſet, and ſet them on worke to pull downe both hedge and ditch of his paſture grounds incloſed: to which worke hee gaue ſuch deſperate incouragements, that theſe vnrulies preſently choſe him for their ringleader, who with them paſſed to Bowthrope, laying all leuel where they came.

(32) Their number encreaſing, and doings outragious, Sir Edmund Windam Knight, at that time high Shiriffe of the Shire, made proclamation among them in the Kings name to depart, which if they did not forthwith, he pronounced them Traitors, but had not his Horſe beene the ſwifter, he had beene either taken or ſlain, thereupon their terror began to be fearefull, & themſelues to be furniſhed with weapons, Armour, and Artillery, daily brought them in abundance by the By-dwellers, beſides ſtore of victuals to maintaine their Campe.

Sir Edmund Windam in danger.

(33) But now conſidering what dangers were open, if diſperſedly ſcattered they ſhould attend their bad worke, they held it beſt policy to draw to one place: and to fortifie themſelues together with further ſtrength; whereupon with full reſolution, Monſhold was thought fitteſt neere vnto Mount Surrey, a place built by theſe Earles of that County, and vpon S. Leonards hill which hangeth ouer Norwich, they vnkennelled themſelues; beſides theſe of Monſhold, a leſſer rabble of them lay at Riſing-chaſe neere Linne, which were rowſed thence by the Gentlemen of thoſe parts: who firſt from Watton, then from Thetford, and next from Brandon, were forced to their litter at Monſhold.

Monſhold the place of the randeuow.

(34) Their parts were rigorous, or rather inhumane euen to their welwillers, for it is a knowne truth, that Sir Roger Woodhouſe in kinde courteſie bringing them two Carts laden with Beere, and another with victuals, was recompenced with the loſſe of all his Horſes, his owne apparell, and his body tugged, and torne, caſt into a ditch, whom laſtly with others was impriſoned by them in the houſe of Mount Surrey, and yet would they ſeeme verie Religious, hauing one Coniers for their Chaplen, who deuoutly ſaid ſeruice vnto them both morning and euening.

The inhumanities of the Commotioners.

(35) To theſe, the lewdly diſpoſed of Suffolke aſſembled, as alſo the ſcum and dregs out of Norwich, adding ſtill fewell to their own ſmoaky flames by firing of Beacons, ringing of Bels, and what not, to ſet all in an vproare: ſome true and faithfull ſubiects they violently led away, and made them of their counſell, namely Thomas Cod, Maior of Norwich, Robert Watſon Preacher, and Thomas Alderiche Gentlemã, Sergeant & Catlyn, Sergeant Gandy, whom they kept fettered, and compelled them to be attendant vpon Kette; who now tooke vpon him to bee the Kings Deputy, and to giue out warrants in his Maieſties name, by vertue of which many of Worſhip and credit were fetched from their dwellings, brought before him, and violently caſt into priſon: their Rabble encreaſed to the number of ſixeteene thouſand men.

Supplies of the commotioners.

Many good ſubiects forced to attend vpon the Rebels.

(36) And that the ſhew of iuſtice and piety was only the marke whereat theſe lawleſſe leuelled, they ordained a tribunall ſeat in an olde tree, whoſe Canopie was the Cope of Heauen: In this ſate the Tanner as Chauncellor or chiefe Iudge, accompanied with his Counſellors, aſſiſted by two choſen men out of euery hundred among them, hither aſſembled the complaints of the Campe, and hence had they commiſſion to fetch out of Ships both Ordinance, powder and ſhotte, and out of Gentlemens houſes all abileaments of warre: and heere ſuch Raskals as had exceeded their commiſsion had iudgement of impriſonment, ſo that this tree was termed, the Oake of Reformation, whence likewiſe ſometimes Sermons were deliuered to the people, and once by the Reuerent Doctor Parker, which had almoſt coſt him his life.

The tree of Reformation.

(37) To theſe the Kings generall Pardon was publikely pronounced by an Herald at Arms, but ſo farre off from embracing, as the Rebels from the height of the hill, ſhot at the Citie, which doing little harme, they remoued their Ordinance to the lower ground, and thence beganne to batter the walles, and without great reſiſtance entred the town, where they became Maſters of al the munitions, and empriſoned the Maior, and many other Citizens.

The great Ordinance wonne by the Rebels.

sought to quiet, and to that end sent the L. William Parr, Marques of Northampton, with fifteen hundred horsemen vnto Norwich, accompanied with the Lords Sheffeild, and Wentworth, besides many Knights; who at his first comming thither, summoned the City to yeeld; the Magistrates whereof as willingly obeyed, and repairing to his Standard, yeelded vp their Cities sword vnto him; declaring themselues true Subiects to the King, though some of the baser sort had fauoured Kets doing, and with them immediately the Lord Marquesse entred the City, which the same night was assaulted by the Rebels, whom hee manfully resisted, and slew three hundred of their riotous rout.

(39) The next day following these bloud-hounds vnkennelled by troupes, and entring the City by the Hospitall, beganne a most cruell fight, wherein the Lord Sheffeild by the fal of his horse into a ditch was butcherly slaine by a Butcher, as he sought to recouer himselfe, and the rebels now fleshed with this their fortunate chance, followed the chase with such slaughter and cry, that they forced the Lord Marquesse to forsake the City, and therein tooke Sir Thomas Cornwallis prisoner, whom they straitly kept in durance till their last ouerthrow. Norwich they ransackt and set on fire, whose ashes as yet fill vppe their ruines, and more had been made, had not God quenched these flames by showres from Heauen.

(40) The Lord Marquesse returned, and the Rebels holding Norwich, it was more then time to looke to the maine chance; and therefore those forces that were gathered to inuade others, were now thought the fittest to secure our selues, ouer whom was appointed the Lord Iohn Dudley, the warlike Earle of Warwicke: hee comming to Cambridge prepared for the enemy, whither resorted the foresaide Lord Marquesse, the Lords Willoughby, Powes, and Gray, his sonnes Ambrose and Robert, with many of the Norfolke men, and the twenty three of August shewed himselfe vpon the plaine before Norwich, whence to saue the effusion of bloud, hee sent Norrey and a Trumpet to summon the City, and to offer a generall pardon; which being againe refused, hee caused his Ordinance to bee planted against S. Steuens gate, and his Pioners to breake open the brasen gate, whereat many made entry, and diuers were slaine.

(41) S. Steuens gate forced open by Canon shot, the Earle of Warwicke entred the City, and with small resistance came into the Market place, where threescore Rebels were incontinently executed by Marshall law. But the Earles carriages passing thorough the City, were surprised and taken by the enemy, wherein was great store of powder and shot, which with triumph they conuaied to their Campe, and tooke it a signe of further successe, their want consisting most in those prouisions, whereupon they manned the streets of that City, and slew very many of the Kings friends; but the showers of arrowes and shot from the kinges Subiects so rained amongst them, that they were forced backe to take shelter in Monsbold their hole of refuge.

(42) The Earle of Warwicke thus mastring the City, shut all the Gates, them onely excepted that gaue way toward Monsbold, and those hee planted with his great Artillery. The Rebels perceiuing what he went about, suddainely made downe towards the Gate, and with great courage and confused cries, fell with such violence vpon their attendants, that they gaue backe and fled, leauing their Ordinance to the will of the Rebels, who presently disposed them amongst their owne, so that the Earle stopped likewise those passages, and imploied all his endeuour to defend the City, which notwithstanding he could not, the Rebels making incursions ouer the riuer from their well stored Campe: and setting the streetes in many places on fire, whose attempts so continued and prospered to euill, as some despairing of any good, counselled the Earle to bee gone. But so farre was he from such staine of honour, that drawing forth his owne sword, commanded other to doe the like, and with an interchangeable kisse confirmed the resolution of his bold courage, a Custome indeed vsed in greatest danger of warre. And thereupon determining another way to worke, sought to stop the passage from all conuoy of victuall; which the Rebels perceiuing, set fire on their Cabbins, and with ensignes displayed, entrenched themselues at the foote of the Hill, in the valley called Dussin-dale, partly vpon vaine Prophecies pronounced among them by certaine wizards, who gaue forth that Hob, Dic, and Hic, (meaning the Rusticks) with their Clubs should fill vp the valley of Dussin-Dale with the bodies of the dead.

The noble resolution of the Earle of Warwick.

The vaine prophesie of the Rebels.

(43) The next day being the seauen and twentieth of August, the Lord Generall prepared for fight, hauing newly receiued a supply of foureteene hundred Lances. But before that Mars should trie his strength by sword, he sent vnto them a Generall pardon for all things that were past, which when they had againe vtterly reiected, he ranged his battels for fight. The Rebels likewise, set themselues in order, where in the fore-ranke all the Gentlemen whom they had taken Prisoners, were placed and coupled in Irons for starting away, so that their dangers were doubled, and themselues exposed to death aswell by their friends, as by their enemies.

The L. Generall offred the rebels a generall pardon.

(44) But before the charge could be giuen, one Miles a most skilfull Gunner amongst them made shot at the Kings Standard, and strucke the Bearer thereof in the thigh, and his horse through the shoulder, which so moued the Earle that he caused a whole volly of Artillery to be discharged against them, when Captaine Drury with his owne band and the Almanes, thrust sore vpon them, and opened their Battell, whereby most of the Captiue-Gentlemen escaped away, vpon which brunt the Earles light horsemen came so valiantly on, that the Rebels gaue backe and fled: and with the formost Robert Ket their Captaine, vppon a swift horse galloped away, the Chase continued three miles and more, with the slaughter of three thousand and fiue hundred rebels.

The Kings Standard strucken.

The Rebels discomfited and many slaine.

(45) Their battell thus broken, and the most part fled: those notwithstanding that kept about the Ordinance, determined to die like men, and inclosing themselues among the Carts and Carriages, had the aduantage of a Trench and certaine stakes stucke against the horsemen, whereby they stoode more resolutely at defence. The Noble Earle pitying their case, and loath to loose so many braue men, sent Norrey King at Armes vnto them, with proffer of pardon if they would lay downe Armes, and returne to obedience, otherwise they well saw, there was no way but death: Their answere was, that they were free borne English men, who disdained all ignominious death, wherunto they said, they were appointed, and barrels of ropes brought into the field (as they were informed) to strangle them, so that if they must needes die, they chose the manly deathes of Souldiers, not trusting the sugred promises for surprize, and then to be trussed vp like dogs.

The compassion of the L. Generall.

(46) Their answere returned, and compassion still working in the Lord Generals breast, euen when hee had set his whole Army against them both of horse and foote; and the signe of battell ready to haue beene giuen, he sent to them once more, to know if they would belieue and embrace their pardon, if hee came in person to declare it to them himselfe; wherunto they answered, that they knew him to be honourable, and would from his mouth most thankefully receiue it: thereupon hee repayred vnto them, and causing againe their pardon to be read, confirmed the same with such effectuall words, as they all cast away their weapons, and with one voice cried, God saue King Edward.

(47) The

(47) The day following, Ket the Captaine of this sedition, crept into a Barne of one M. Richer of Swanington, was by two of his seruants apprehended, & with 20. horsemen conueied to Norwich, where 9. of the chiefest Rebels had iudgement of death; and were all of them hanged vpon the Oake of Reformation, which not till then, had the true note of that name. Ket with his brother William were broght vnto London, and theuce backe againe into Norfolke, where William Ket the younger was hanged vpon the high Steeple of Windmondham, and Robert Ket the Arch-Rebell in chaines vpon the Castell of Norwich, whose Citizens annually solemnized the day of their deliuery with no lesse ioy, then the Iewes did when they had escaped the sword of wicked Haman.

(48) These hazards set in the South, West, and East, the North likewise among them would come in for a cast, as forward and able to vndergoe rebellion, and their zeale as hote as any others, the occasion conceiued, was, the Papall Religion abolished by Law, whose tottering toppe they meant to make steady by maine strength of Armes, notwithstanding the very foundations were so shrewdly vndermined. The place where this canker beganne was Seimer in the North-riding in Yorkshire spreading it selfe further into the East-riding also, & the first broachers of this giddy heady wine, were persons no better then William Ombler a Yeoman, Thomas Dale a Parrish Clerke, and one Steeuenson the Post, imployed to blanch forth these businesses betwixt them.

(49) Their pretences were faire, as to restore the Church her right, and to disburden the land of all grieuances imposed, this string euer sounding, that the Pope was the Man, that King Edward was an Intruder, if not a meere heretike, that the Church had the power of both the swords, which now vpon a blind prophesie they presupposed should bee drawne against the King & his Nobles, whose times (as they beleeued) should bee no more, but that the land should bee ruled by foure gouernours, when the Commons should meete in a Parliament assembled from the foure winds, which they interpreted from the foure Coasts of England, whereof themselues now made the last.

(50) First therefore to raise men, and to bring al into confusion, they fired their Beacons, whence the sparkes of sedition were carried amaine; for the rudest alwayes vnwilling to labour, and the fittest fewell to breake into flame, flocked together on heapes, each one hauing a Common-wealth in his head, and all of them disliking the reformation of religion that the King had commanded: Among these, the most seditious had euer a voice which drew consent to forward the Action, and especially to beare downe the rich, whereof they made their first assay vpon white a Gentleman, Savage a Marchant, Clopton and Berry, whom they cruelly murthered, and dispoiling them of their apparrell left their naked bodies on the Would before Seimer, thence passing forward from Towne to Town, tooke many away that were vnwilling to goe, and all to fulfill their perfidious prophesie.

(51) Their number now increased vnto three thousand, the Country beganne to grow in great feare, especially the Gentlemen, and the richer sort, seeing their liues and substance thus thirsted for and sought after; but presently downe came the kings pardon with proffers of life, which so willingly was embraced, that Ombler & Dale were quite forsaken, & almost left alone, who with Wright, Peacocke, Weatherell, and Buttry were worthily executed at Yorke vpon the one and twenty of September following.

(52) As the Commons by these tumultuous rebellions greatly disquieted the peace of the land, so the chiefest Lords did disturb the Court of the yong King, where the greatest Counsellors through emulation and disdaine, banded each against others, without respect of themselues, or regard of their Soueraigne; whereof the Kings vncles, the Protector and Admirall are noted for the first, and with the first paid their offences with their liues: they both were the brethren of Queene Iane the Kings mother deceased, the elder Lord Edward Duke of Sommerset was Protector of his Person, Realms and Dominions. And Thomas Lord Seamer Baron of Sudley the younger, high Admirall of England, both worthy persons, had they known their own worths: for so long stood they in safety of life and true honor as the bounds of brotherhood and nature stood vnuiolated betwixt them, but that once broken, their liues lay open to dishonour and death.

(53) The younger brother Lord Thomas had married Queene Katherine Parre, the last of the many wiues of King Henry the eight; who vndoubtedly bore himselfe no meaner by that match, neither she the state or name of a Dowager Queene: though of herselfe a woman complete with singular humility. And the Dutchesse of Sommerset matched with the greatest Peere in the Land, held her State equall to her husbands degree: and for place and precedency, as report hath diuulged, the lamentable tragedie of these two great Brethren beganne; which now in acting brought vpon the Stage at once their owne destructions, the lands rebellions, and the griefes of the good young King, into a fatall and vnrecouerable sickenesse, whereof lastly followed his death.

(54) So subtle is the old Serpent, and so ready euer to sow tares among wheate, that hee disturbed religions proceedings with al these calamities almost at one time; first, setting matters of discord betwixt them, by scandalizing tongues, then iealousies of suspitions spiced with enuie; and lastly hatred vnto death. Insomuch that the Protector suffered his brother to bee accused and condemned in Parliament of high Treason (whether true or false God onely knoweth) and vnder his owne hand writing, committed his head to the axe: wherby one of the 3 twisted cords of Englands strength was cut asunder by that fatall and vnhappy stroake, and his owne now made loose in the Cable, proued too weake by farre to hold fast the Anchor, whereby the shippe-wracke of his owne life was shortly made.

(55) The Lord Admirals inditement was, that hee had purposed to destroy the young King, and to translate the Crowne vnto himselfe, as standeth recorded in Statute made the third of this Kinges Raigne, for which the twenty of March he suffered death vpon the Tower-hill; which as many supposed that it was the Dutches of Sommersets doings; so the wiser sort feared, lit would bee the ruine of her husband the Duke, the experiment whereof had often beene approued, and indeed was too fatally linked as it chanced in these two brethren.

(56) For the Admirall being made away by order of law, the giddy Commons without either order, or law, rose vp in their Insurrections as hath been said: And the Lords returned from their suppressions, beganne forthwith to enuy and article against the Protector, which they published by Proclamation against him, wherein hee was accused, 1. of euill gouernment: 2. the losse of the kings Peers in France: 3. to bee ambitious in his buildings, 4. regardlesse of the Counsellors: 5. a sower of sedition amongst the Nobles: 6. dangerous to the King: 7. a scandalizer of the Councell, 8. and lastly, that hee was no lesse then a Traitor. Against whom they desired the aid of the Londoners to take from him the King; to all which seuenteene Counsellers subscribe their names.

(57) These Statists in consultation dayly at London, and the Protector residing still with the King, intercourse of letters were interchangeably both sent and receiued, whereof two, from either part one, and euen at one instant were sent vnto the Lord Maior and and Citizens of London, requiring their aide in these their opposite quarrels, and surely in their assembly the talk of the Lords by the Recorder was so wel tolde, as had not a graue *Citizen stept vp betimes, the common Councell had granted aid against their King, whose wisdome and loyalty, in regarde my selfe a Citizen, would haue it recorded to his euerlasting memory, and an example and motiue for our obedient loue and duety toward our Soueraignes, I will insert as I find them vttered and spoken.

George Stradlins his Oration.

"(57) In this case (said hee) good it is to thinke "on things past, to auoide the danger of thinges to "come; for I remember a story written by Fabian "in his Chronicles of the warres betwixt the King "and his Barons, who euen then as our Lords doe "now, demanded aid of the Maior and Commons "of London, against their Soueraingne King Henry "the third, and that in a cause rightfull, and good "for the Common-weale, which was the execution "of certain wholesome lawes, somwhat derogating "from his princely prerogatiue, which hee would "not permit. The aide was granted, and quarrell "came vnto battell, wherein the Lords preuailed, "and tooke the King and his sonne prisoners. But "they againe restored to liberty, among other con-"ditions this was one, that the King should not "onely grant his free pardon to the Lords, but also "vnto the Citizens of London; which was done, yea "and the same confirmed by Parliament. But what "followed? was it forgotten? no surely, nor ne-"uer forgiuen during the Kings life: for the liber-"ties of the City were taken away, strangers appoin-"ted to bee our heads and Gouernours, the Citi-"zens giuen away both body and goods, and from "one persecution to another, were most miserably "afflicted: such it is to enter the wrath of a Prince, "which (as Salomon saith) is death: Wherfore, for-"asmuch as this aide is required of the Kings Maie-"sty, whose voice (being our high Shepheard) wee "ought to obey, rather then to hearken to the "Lords, whom neuertheless I wish not to bee vt-"terly cast off, my counsell is, that they with vs, "and wee with them, become humble Petitioners "vnto his Highnesse, that it would please him to "heare such complaints against the Lord Protector, "as may be iustly alleadged and proued, and I doubt "not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither "shall the King, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to "seeke for further aide, neither we to offend any of "them both.

(58) These words well weighed, and the Councel dissolued, fiue hundred Londoners were prepared in a readinesse: for Sir Philip Hobby being sent from the Lords to the King, so deliuered their minds, that the Lord Protector was commanded out of presence, and the next day being the twelfth of October, the Lords of the Councell resorted to Windsor, where they so wrought with the King, as his vncle was deliuered into their hands, whom the same night they imprisoned in Beauchamps Tower in the same Castel, and the next day strongly attended, brought him to London, whence the streetes were guarded onely by housholders, the Aldermen taking the charge of the busines, and so to the great griefe and wondering of the people hee was conueyed to the Tower, and there left.

The L. Protector committed to the Tower.

(59) Whither shortly after the Lords themselues repaired, and charged the Protector with these 20. Articles as followeth.

M. Fox in Acts & Mon.

Articles drawne against the Lord Protector.

1 That at his entry into that waighty office, hee was expresly prohibited to doe any thing in State without the assent of the last Kings Executors.

2 That hee had contrariwise vpon his owne authority both subuerted lawes, and staied iustice, as well by letters, as commandement.

3 That he had deliuered diuers persons arrested, and committed to prison for felonie, manslaughter, murther and treason, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

4 That hee had made Captains and Lieutenants ouer waighty affaires vnder his owne Seale and Writing.

5 That hee had alone communicated with forraine Ambassadors about most weighty State affaires.

6 That hee had checked diuers of the Kings Priuy Councell, speaking for the good of the State, yea and threatned to displace them if they consented not to his mind.

7 That hee had against law erected a Court of Requests in his owne house, whither were enforced diuers of the Kings Subiects to answere for their Free-holds.

8 That he had for money disposed Offices in the Kinges gifte, money, leases, and Wardes, and giuen presentations of Benefices, and Bishoprickes, yea and medled with sale of the Kinges lands, which by office hee could not, without consent of the maior voice of the Councell.

9 That hee had commanded multiplication by Alcumistric to the abuse of the Kings coine.

10 That against the King and Councels will, hee had set forth a Proclamation against inclosures, which had caused daungerous insurrections in the land, wherein diuers of the Kings liege Subiects haue beene spoiled, and many a worthy man therein slaine.

11 That to the same end hee had giuen commission with Articles annexed concerning inclosures of Commons, high wayes, and decayed Cottages, giuing the Commissioners authority to heare and determine the same causes, contrary to the lawes and statutes of the Realme.

12 That hee had suffered Rebels and traitours to assemble, and lie in Campe and Armour, against the King, his Nobles, & Gentlemen, without any speedy suppressing of them.

13 That by his gifts in money, with promises of Fees, rewards and seruices, he had encouraged many of the said rebels.

14 That in fauour of them contrary to law he had caused a Proclamation to bee made, that none of the said Rebels, or Traitors should be sued, or vexed for any of their offences committed in the said Rebellion.

15 That hee had liked well of these rebellions, and had said that the couetousnesse of the Gentry gaue the occasion, affirming that it was better for the Commons to die, then to perish for lacke of liuing.

16 That hee had reported the Lords of the Parliament were loath to reform themselues for the reformation of Inclosures, and therefore the people had good cause to reforme the thinges themselues.

17 That vpon the report of the defaultes and lackes of Bulloigne nothing was there amended.

18 That the Forts of Newhauen and Blacknesse standing in want of men and victuall, whereof hee was informed, were suffered notwithstanding still to want, to the great encouragement of the French, and dishonour of the English.

19 That he had vntruly published, that the Lords at London minded to destroy the King, which hee instantly desired hee would neuer forget, and to that end instigated many young Lords, whereby sedition and discord was made among the Nobles.

20 Lastly, that whereas the Lords assembled at London, onely to consult vpon a charitable communication to be had with the Protector for his misgouernment of the King and Realme, hee contrariwise sent letters of credence to many places and persons, that the said Lords were no lesse then high Traitors to the King, and great disturbers of the whole realme.

All these accusations notwithstanding (the young King so labouring it) he was released from the Tower the sixt of February following vnto his free liberty, though not vnto his former authority, and so remained remained vntouched for the ſpace of two yeeres and two dayes.

(61) Whileſt theſe his and other troubles were commencing in England, the Lord Grey of Wilton left Lieutenant of the North, remained in Scotland, where many feates of warre were vndergone, and many Forts fortified, and ſome taken, ſuch were Lowden, Hadington, and Yeſter, at whoſe aſſault certaine opprobrious ſpeeches in moſt contemptuous manner were vttered by a Scotiſh man againſt King Edward of England, whereat the Lord Grey was ſo offended, as vpon compoſition for the deliuerie of the Caſtell, all were let goe with life, onely that perſon excepted, and his name knowne to bee Newton, was appointed to die for the ſame; but hee denying the words, impoſed them vpon one Hamilton, a man valorous inough, and wrongfully touched, who denied the accuſation, and challenged Newton the combat, which hee accepted, and in performance ſlew Hamilton, though more at diſaduantage then for lacke either of courage or ſtrength: The victor was rewarded with a great chaine of gold, and the gowne that the Lord Grey ware at the preſent, though many maligned and accuſed him ſtill to bee the vtterer of thoſe baſe words.

(62) The Engliſh keeping foot ſtill in Scotland, burnt Dawketh and Muskelburgh, and fortified Hadington both with munition and men, ſpoyling the Country, ſaith Biſhoppe Leſly, all about Edenburgh, Lowthian and Mers: repairing of Forts, and placing of Garriſons, as if they meant there to remaine and abide: but their young Queene being conuaied into France, and the Scots aided with the aſſiſtance of the French, ſo quit themſelues, that they voided their land of the Engliſh, and recouered of them all they had loſt. In which times of variable ſucceſſe, the King but a child, the Nobles at variances, and the combuſtuous Commons obedient to neither, the French ſought to recouer the holds that the Engliſh had in their Country, and firſt by ſtealth meant to ſurpriſe the fortreſſe of Bulloignberg, vnto which enterpriſe ſeuen thouſand were choſen, vnder the conduct of Monſieur Chatillon.

(63) Theſe ſecretly marching in the night with ladders and furniture meete for the enterprize, approached within a quarter of a mile vnto Bullingberg fort, amongſt whom was an Engliſh Souldier diſcharged out of their pay, for that he had taken a French woman to wife. This Carter for ſo was his name got entertainement vnder Chatillon, and now vnderſtanding whereabout they went, haſtily made from his Company, and gaue the Alarum to his Countrimen within the Fort; where Sir Nicholas Arnalt Captaine of the peece, cauſed him to bee drawne vp betwixt two pikes to the height of the wall, vnto whom hee declared the attempt in hand, & among them ſtood ſo valiantly in defence of the fort, that hee gaue many a wound, and receiued ſome himſelf: by him and this meanes the Peece was quit from ſurpriſall, and the ſlaughter of the French ſo great that fifteene Wagons went laden away with dead Corps.

(64) This loſſe ſuſtained, and the Engliſh maſters in thoſe parts of their Maine, the French ſought to trie fortune for their Iſles in the Seas, namely Garneſey and Ierſey, poſſeſt and ſubiect to King Edwards Crowne, their preparations were great, and their Marſhalliſts many; which notwithſtanding with ſuch loſſe were beaten backe from their bankes, as a thouſand men at Armes were ſlaine in the attempt, & the ſucceſſe ſo vnfortunate, as the French for feare of further diſcouragement forbad the report, and made an inhibition, not to mention the expedition of that iourney.

(65) Neuertheleſſe the French King ceaſed not his deſired purpoſes, till hee had got by ſurrender Hambletowne, Blackneſſe, Bulloignberg, and the town of Bulloigne it ſelfe, though bought at a deare rate, and deliuered with great griefe to the Engliſh; vnto ſuch a lamentable ſtate, and diſhonourable compoſition was the good King Edward brought, by the bandings of his great Counſellors, and inſurrections of his vnruly Commons; after which calamities a great and mortall diſeaſe followed, namely the ſweating ſickneſſe, that raged extreamely through the land, wherein died the two ſonnes of Charles Brandon, both of them Dukes of Suffolke, beſides an infinite number of men in their beſt ſtrengths; which followed onely Engliſhmen in forraine Countrey, no other people infected therewith, wherby they were both feared and ſhunned in all places where they came.

(66) And to fill vp the dolours of theſe dolefull times, the good Duke of Sommerſet was againe apprehended, euen when the leaſt ſuſpition was of any vndirect workings: for vpon his firſt releaſement, to linke a firme loue betwixt him and the potent Earle of Warwicke, his moſt malignant; a marriage was contracted betwixt the Lord Liſle his eldeſt ſonne & heire, and the Lady the Earles eldeſt daughter, which was ſolemnized with great ioy at Sheene, in preſence of the young King; this amity was outwardly carried with all faire ſhewes for a time, though inward hatred lay ſecretly hid, as by the ſequell incontinentlie appeared: for after a ſolemne creation of many Eſtates, wherein the Earle of Warwicke had his ſtyle raiſed to bee Duke of Northumberland, vnto whoſe rayes at that time moſt of the Courtiers caſt their eyes: the ſparkes of emulation began preſently to breake forth; where the ſimplicity of the one gaue aduantage to the other, to compaſſe that which long had beene ſought.

(67) The Duke of Sommerſet not well aduiſed, and yeelding too much vnto Sycophant flatteries, was put in feare of ſome ſodaine attempt intended againſt him, and therefore counſelled to weare vnder his garment a coate of defence, which hee accordingly did, and being ſo armed came vnto the Councell Table, ſuppoſing no man had known of any ſuch thing; but his boſome being opened and the Armour perceiued, hee was forthwith apprehended, as intending the death of ſome Counſellor, and by Northumberland ſo vehemently taxed (who in Counſell was euer the principall man) that hee was forthwith attached, and ſent to the Tower, vpon the ſixteenth of October with the Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Michael Stanhop, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Miles Partridge, and the next day the Dutcheſſe his wife was likewiſe committed; all of them for ſuſpition of treaſon and fellonie; and he ſtanding ſo indited vpon the *ſecond of December following, was arraigned at Weſtminſter, attended with the Axe of the Tower, Billes, Halberds, and Pollaxes a great number.

(68) His inditement was for treaſon and fellony, and the ſame vrged vnto extremity, with many amplifications, and bitter inuectiues, eſpecially that hee had ſought and pretended the deathes of the Duke of Northumberland, the Lord Marqueſſe, and Pembroke: where after many mild anſweres to theſe matters obiected, he put himſelfe to be tried by his Peeres, who acquitted him of treaſon, but found the inditement of fellonie: when preſently the Axe was commaunded away, whereat the ſhout of the people ſhewed the great affection that was borne to the Duke: little miſtruſting that the ſentence of death was pronounced againſt him, or that the kings vncle ſhould die as a fellon; neither did the Statute intend any ſuch thing as ſome are of opinion, but rather was purpoſely made for the ſuppreſſion of rebellions, and vnlawfull aſſemblies, wherein ſuch as ſhould ſeeke or procure the death of any Counſellor ſhould be guilty as in caſe of fellonie. But ſuch was the pleaſure of the all ordering power, that he which knew no theft ſhould die for that ſinne; ſo that neither himſelfe, nor his wiſeſt Counſellors demaunded the benefite of his Clergy which would haue ſaued his life if it had beene required.

(70) Dearely beloued friends, I am brought hither to ſuffer death, albeit I neuer offended againſt the King, neither in word nor deed, and haue alwayes been as faithfull and true vnto this Realme, as any man hath been: but forſomuch as I am by law condemned to die, I doe acknowledge my ſelfe as well as others to be ſubiect thereunto: wherefore to teſtifie mine obedience which I owe to the lawes, I am come hither to ſuffer death, whereunto I willingly offer my ſelfe with moſt hearty thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might through ſodaine death haue taken away my life, that I neither ſhould haue acknowledged him nor my ſelfe.

(74) His ſickneſſe continuing with great doubt of his life, vpon purpoſe ſaith Grafton to alter the ſucceſsion of the Crowne, three marriages were in one day ſolemnized, whereof the firſt was betwixt the Lord Guilford Dudley, fourth ſonne to the Duke of Northumberland, and the Lady Iane, eldeſt daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke: the ſecond was betwixt the Lord Herbert, ſonne and heire to William Earle of Pembroke, and the Lady Katherine the yonger daughter of the ſaid Duke of Suffolke, and the third was betweene Henry L. Haſtings, ſonne and heire of Frances Earle of Huntington, and Katherine the youngeſt daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which tending (ſaith he) to the diſheriſon of the rightfull heires, they proued nothing proſperous, for two of them were preſently made fruſtrate, the one by death, and the other by diuorce.

Three marriag. entended to peruert the ſucceſſion.

(75) The policy eſtabliſhed, and languiſhing ſickneſſe of the King gaue way vnto ſuch, as ſought the euerſion of the State, & alienation of the Crown: In whoſe eye no head was ſeene fitter for that faire Diademe, then was Guilfords Bride, Iane the elder daughter of Suffolke, whoſe mother Lady Francis then liuing, was the daughter of Mary the French Queen, the younger ſiſter to King Henry the eight, vnto whom King Edward ouer-wrought in his weakenes, ordained his Crowne by Will, at the ſuggeſtions of ſuch Politiques, as meant to diſherite the two lawfull Princes, Mary and Elizabeth, and to impugne the Statute, in caſe prouided for the ſucceſſion of K. Henry the eight his children: vnto which Will (O griefe to heare) ſubſcribed all the Kings Councell, moſt of the Nobility, the reuerend Biſhops, and all the Iudges of the land, one onely excepted, euen Sir Iames Hales knight, a Iuſtice of the common Pleas, vpright in iudgement, & a fauourer of the Goſpell, he, I ſay, neuer would write or conſent to the diſheriting of the Lady Mary.

Lady Iane made ſucceſſor by K. Edward.

Sir James Hales refuſed to ſubſcribe to K. Edwards Will.

(76) The King thus accompliſhing what his Statiſts had wrought, lay languiſhing in his faintnes: the end wherefore could not be expected but onely by death, and now being worne almoſt to nothing (his laſt breath drawing to the limits of Nature) he lift vp his eyes with a prepared heart, and prayed as followeth.

K. Edwards prayer.

Lord God deliuer mee out of this miſerable and wretched life, and take me among thy Choſen: howbeit not my will but thy will be done; Lord I commit my ſpirite to thee: O Lord thou knoweſt how happy it were for mee to be with thee: yet for thy choſen ſake, if it bee thy will ſend, me life and health that I may truly ſerue thee: O my Lord bleſſe thy people and ſaue thine inheritance: O Lord God ſaue thy choſen people of England: O my Lord God defend this Realme from Papiſtrie, and maintaine thy true religion, that I and my people may praiſe thy holy name for thy ſonne Ieſus Chriſts ſake.

So turning his face, and ſeeing ſome by him ſaide, I thought you had not beene ſo nigh: yes, ſaid Doctor Owen, wee heard you ſpeake to your ſelfe; then ſaid the King, I was praying to God: O I am faint, Lord haue mercy vpon me, and receiue my ſpirit: and in ſo ſaying, gaue vp the Ghoſt, to the great loſſe of England, in whom they had conceiued moſt hopes.

(77) His vertues were rare and many, exceeding moſt

moſt Princes, and vices ſo few, that none can be taxed with leſſe; very learned (according to his yeeres) he was in the Latine and Greek tongues, the French, Spaniſh, and Italian, yea (and ſaith Hieronymus Cardanus) he was adorned with the skill of Logicke, naturall Philoſophie, and Muſicke, and for Aſtronomy (ſaith he) my ſelfe had experience, whom he learnedly opposed of the cauſe and courſe of Comets: for Humanity, he is the very Image of Morality, and in princely graue Maieſty beſt beſeeming a King: briefly, hee may well ſeeme to be a miracle in Nature: nor doe I ſpeake thus Rhetorically to amplifie things, or to make them more then truth is, for the truth is more then I do vtter: and in this hee was moſt admirable, that hee could tell and recite all the Ports, Hauens, and Creekes, not within his owne Realme onely, but alſo in Scotland, and likewiſe in France, what comming in there was, how the tide ſerued in euery of them, what burden of Shippe, and what winde beſt ſerued the comming in into them.

His learning.

His Memory.

(78) Of all his Nobles, Gentry, Iuſtices, and Magiſtrates, he tooke ſpeciall name of their Hoſpitality, and religious conuerſations, and that which is beſt accepted of a Prince, hee was very liberall, louing, mercifull, meeke and gentle towards his people, and ſo farre from bloud, as hee euer fauoured and ſpared as much as might bee the life of man, yea euen of Rebels, as wee haue ſeene; neither was hee willing to put Heretickes to death, as in a certaine diſſertation had once with M. Cheeke it appeared: inſomuch that when Ioan Butcher ſhould be burned for her hereſie, all the Counſell could not moue him to ſet his hand to the warrant of her execution, vntill D. Cranmer his Godfather, Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury laboured to induce him, vnto whom hee ſaid, what my Lord? will you haue me to ſend her quicke to hell, and taking the pen vſed this ſpeech: I will lay all the charge hereof vpon Cranmer before God. Then how his hand had beene gotten for his vncles death is to bee admired.

His Care.

His Mercy.

(79) But his conſtancy vnto Chriſts Goſpell, with the abandoning of all ſuperſtition, was very admirable, one example among many wee will not let to declare. Lady Mary his ſiſter through the ſuit of Charles the Emperour, made great meanes to haue Maſſe ſaid in her houſe, and that to bee done without all preiudice of law: the greatneſſe of her Perſon being the immediate ſucceſſor, and the might of the Emperour in amitie with England, moued the Councell to giue their conſent to the ſuit; to forward which Cranmer Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury accompanied with Ridley Biſhoppe of London were imployed from them to the King, who hearing their meſſage, gaue the replication ſo grounded vppon Scripture, as they gaue ouer to vrge more that way: but like Politicians alleadged the danger in breach of amity with the Emperour, to which the King anſwered, hee would rather aduenture the hazard of his own life then to grant that which was not agreeable to the truth. The Biſhops yet vrged him with the bonds of nature, and ſubmiſſiuely ſaid, they would haue no nay: the King ſeeing himſelfe ſo importunated, burſt into weeping, and ſobbingly deſired them to be content, whereat the teares ſo abundantly burſt from their eyes, as they departed his preſence not able to ſpeake. And for a further teſtimony of this yong Kings zeale, reade if you pleaſe a letter ſent vnto his ſiſter the Princeſſe Lady Mary, out of the originall.

K. Edwards zeale to Chriſts Goſpell.

(80) Right deare, and right entirely beloued ſiſter we greet you well, and let you know that it grieueth vs much to perceiue no amendment in you of that, which wee for good cauſe, your ſoules health, our conſcience, and common tranquility of our Realme haue ſo long deſired; aſſuring you, that our ſufferance hath more demonſtration of naturall loue then contentation of our conſcience, and foreſight of our ſafety. Wherefore, although you giue vs occaſion aſmuch almoſt as in you is, to diminiſh our naturall loue; yet bee wee loath to feele it decay, and meane not to bee ſo careleſſe of you as wee bee prouoked. And therfore meaning your weale, and therewith ioyning a care not to be found guilty in our own conſcience to God, hauing cauſe to require forgiuenеſſe that wee haue ſo long for reſpect of loue towards you omitted our bounde duety, we do ſend at this preſent our right truſty, & right welbeloued Counſellor the L. Rich, our Chancellor of England, our truſty and right well beloued Counſellor Sir Anthony Wingfield Knight, Comptroler of our Houſhold, and Sir Will. Peter *Knight, one of our two principall Secretaries in meſſage to you touching the order of your houſe, willing you to giue the firme credite in thoſe things they ſhal ſay to you from vs, & do there in our name. K. Edwards letter to Lady Mary.

(81) The fruites of which Religion this godly King ſhewed by his workes of compaſſion towardes the poore, & that eſpecially vpon the foundation of Chriſts Hoſpitall, the late ſuppreſſed place of the Grey Friers in London, and that vpon occaſion as followeth. It chanced the reuerend Biſhop Doctor Ridley to preach before his Maieſty at Weſtminſter, wherin hee Chriſtianlike exhorted the rich to be merciful vnto the poore, and to that end amplified the words of the Text againſt the mercileſſe rich, and the negligence of ſuch as were in great place. The Sermon ended, and the King ſet to dinner, hee ſent to the Biſhop, commanding him not to depart the Court, before he knew his further pleaſure, and thereupon cauſing two Chaires to be ſet in the Gallery, all others auoided, hee compelled the Biſhoppe to ſit downe by his ſide, and in no wiſe would admitte him to bee vncouered.

D. Ridleies ſermon before King Edward.

(82) Where entring conference, he firſt gaue him heartie thankes for his Sermon, repeating vnto him the chiefe points thereof, and cõming to his exhortation for the poore, he then told him that he thought himſelfe firſt touched in the ſpeech; for ſaide he, my Lord you ſpeake to them in authority, whereof vnder God I am the chiefe, and muſt firſt make anſwere to him if I be negligent, and therefore I thinke you principally meant me: Gods commandement I know moſt expreſly inioineth vs to haue compaſſion of his poore members, for whom we muſt make account; and truly my Lord I am moſt willing to trauell that way, not doubting but that your long approued learning and wiſdome, whoſe zeale is ſuch as wiſheth them helpe; but that alſo you had conference with others what is beſt herein to be done, which I am alſo deſirous to know, and therefore I pray ſay freely your mind.

The conference betwixt the King and Biſhoppe Ridley.

(83) The mouer vnto theſe pious conſiderations little looking for ſuch queſtions of the Prince, ſate a while ſilent, ouerioyed at his words, and laſtly vnprepared of any preſent inſtructions, told the King that the Citizens of London were beſt able to direct the plot, whoſe great Charity, and well ordered gouernement, beſides their dayly charges, being ouerburdened with poore, had ſufficient experience, and if it would pleaſe his Maieſtie to direct his letters vnto them himſelfe, he would be very ready to further this godly reſolution ſo far as his meanes might any wiſe extend: whereupon the King preſently commanded his letters to be writ, and would not ſuffer the Biſhoppe to depart before himſelfe had thereto ſet his hand and ſignet, deſiring him to deliuer the ſame to the Lord Maior, and with him to conferre about this buſineſſe, which hee wiſhed might be accompliſhed with all expedition.

K. Edwards great care for the poor

(84) The Biſhoppe as ready as the King was deſirous, poſted apace to the Lord Maior of London, where deliuering the letter, offered his aſſiſtance to forward the worke, and they together with ſome Aldermen, and twenty foure Commoners agreede vpon three degrees of the poore, and them diuided againe into nine.

King Edwards letter deliuered to the L. Maior.

(85) The Booke thus drawne, and preſented to the King, he thereupon deſired to be accounted the chiefe Founder of their reliefe, and forthwith gaue vnto the City S. Bartholmewes Hoſpitall by Smithfield, and the Grey-Friers Church neere adioyning, with with all the reuenewes belonging thereto; his princely house of Bridewell, anciently the Mansion of many English Kings, wherein also their Courts of Iustice had beene kept, & sumptuously new built by King Henry the eight for the receit of the Emperour, he gaue to the L. Maior and Citizens to be a house of correction for lewde and dissolute liuers, and to set on worke the idle and loitering vagabonds, whose maintenance with the new reedified Hospitall of S. Thomas in Southwarke, hee gaue seuen hundred Markes by yeere out of the rents of the Hospitall of Saint Iohn Baptist or Sauoy, with all the beds, bedding, and other furniture thereto belonging, whereby the poore thus distinguished, were by his godly furtherance thus prouided for.

(86) The Kinges charitable giftes confirmed by Charter, and a Petition exhibited for liberty to take in Mortmaine of lands to a yeerely value without further licence, a place being left in the Patent to containe the summe, King Edward presently called for penne and inke, and with his owne hand filled vppe the space with these words, foure thousand Markes by yeere: which done, hee burst forth and said; Lord God I yeelde thee most heartie thankes, that thou hast giuen me life thus long to finish this worke to the glory of thy name.

(87) Now as this godly King was carefull in redeeming the time, so likewise to take as it were an account of himselfe, hee kept a iournall booke or Record written with his owne hand, how all things proceeded with him, and with the State, euen from the first day of his raigne vnto his death: whose many vertues as they were inferior to none of his worthy Progenitors, and zeale little short to the best Kings of Iudah; so was hee soone mist of all his loyall Subiects, when the bosome of Gods Saints were opened to the persecutors swords.

(89) He died at Greenwich vpon Thursday the sixt day of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, one thousand fiue hundred fifty three, and the seuenteenth of his age, when hee had raigned sixe yeeres fiue months, and nine daies, and was buried vpon the ninth of August following, in the Chappell of S. Peters Church at Westminster, neere vnto his Grandfather King Henrie the seuenth.

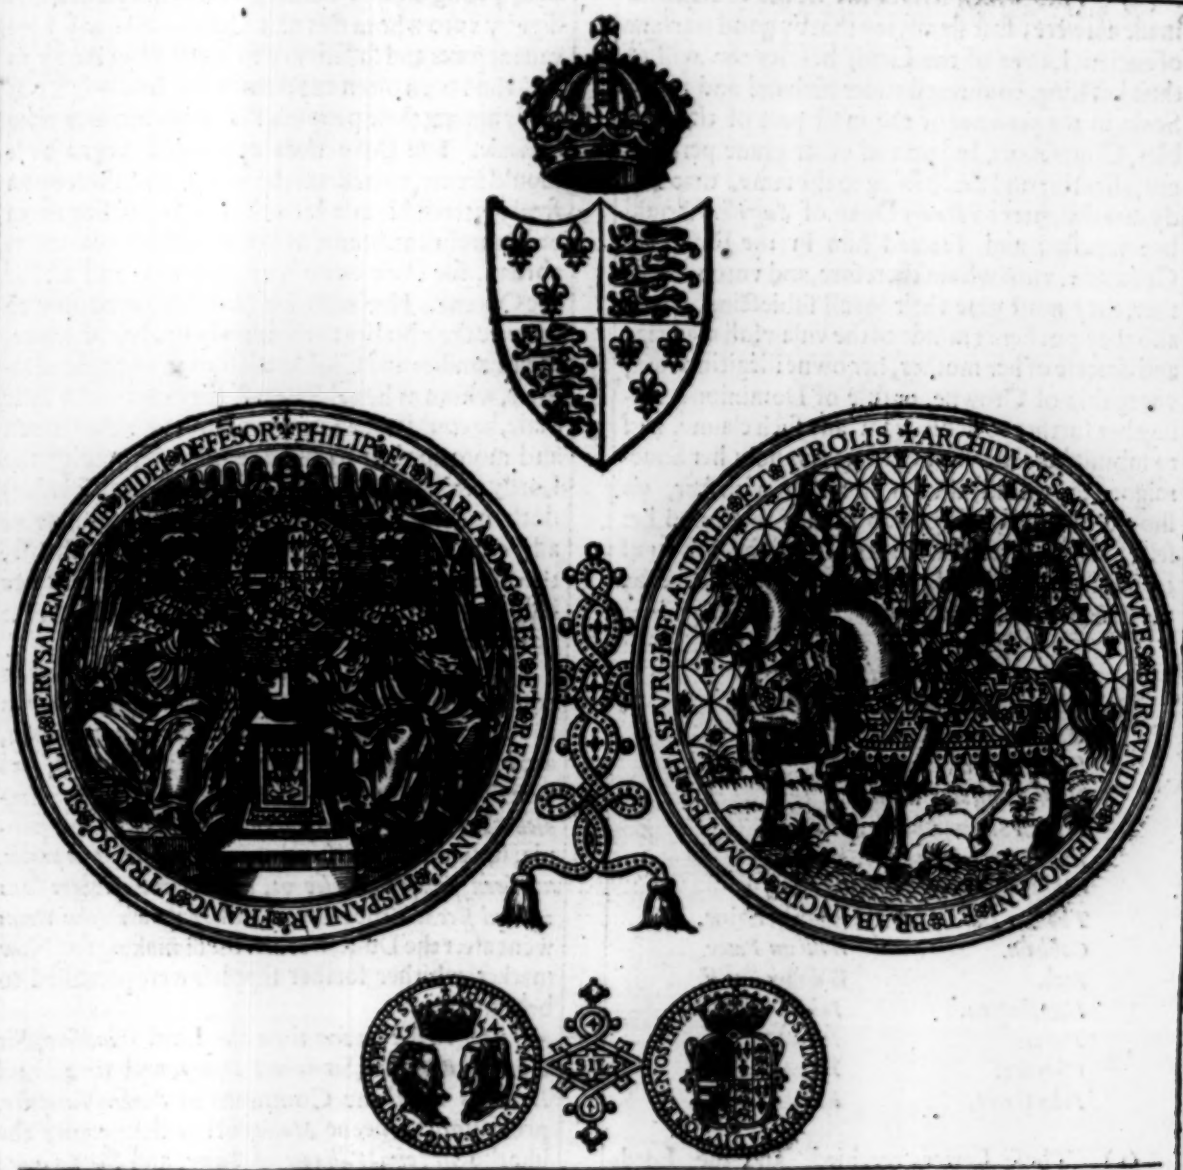
MARIE QVEENE OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c. THE SIXTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HER RAIGNE, MARIAGE, ACTS, AND DEATH.



CHAPTER XXIII.

KING EDWARDS life ended by his lingring diſeaſe, and the Stateſmē intending to eſtabliſh his will; for the ſpace of two daies his death was kept ſecret, and much conſultation among the Nobility had of the buſineſſe; all of them affecting the election of Iane, leſt Mary ſhould vndoe what Edward had done; to ſupport which purpoſe, many projects were caſt, and many opinions giuen how to proceed, yet all iointlie light in this point, that London was the hand which muſt reach Iane the Crowne: whoſe Citizens aſſiſtance if they might bee got, the greateſt difficulty (as they held it) was halfe vndergone. And therefore to mould them for Iane, and to marre them for Mary, the Councell ſent for the L. Maior of London, ſixe Aldermen, and twelue Commoners Marchants.

Conſultation for the diſpoſing of the Crowne.

London the ſureſt key in time of trouble.

(2) Theſe comming to the Court, were ſecretlie certified of King Edward his death, where his Will declared, and Letters Patents ſhewed for the diſinheriting of his two ſiſters, and the raiſing of Suffolkes daughter vnto the Crowne; whoſe religion was ſo zealous, and vertues ſo many (as in truth no Princeſſe was poſſeſſed with more) were ſo well ſet forth by theſe graue Counſellors, that the Lord Maior and Citizens tooke their oathes for Lady Iane, vnto whoſe obedience they promiſed to ſecure the City.

The Lord Maior and Citizens ſworne to Lady Iane.

(3) Lady Marie at Houſdon hearing theſe news, preſentlie remoued to her Mannor of Kenningall in Norfolke: from whence ſhee wrote her letters vnto the Lords of the Councell, wherein ſhee maruelleth that her brothers death ſhould ſo long be kept from her:

Lady Marie writeth to the Lords her: that shee being the Princesse next in blood, ordained by act of Parliament, and King Henries Testament to succeede, her right enrowled in the Records, by the authority of her Father and brother, their owne knowledge and prescription to her most rightfull Titles, yet now in consultation to vndoe these prouisions both against God and natural allegeance; shee could not but maruell, and rather would construe for some politicke consideration, and take them in the best part, then to possesse the least thought of any disloialty in them; and therefore willed them vpon the receite of her letters to proclaime her Queene, and gouernour of the Realme, in the Citie of London, and in other publike places, as in such cause appertaineth, with all due obseruances, as they tendred her displeasure and their owne safeties: this letter was signed at the Mannor of Keningall vnder her Signet the ninth of Iuly 1553.

(4) Vnto which letters the Lords foorthwith made answere; first signifying that by good warrant of ancient Lawes of the Land, besides the will of their last King, confirmed vnder his hand and broad Seale, in the presence of the most part of the Nobles, Counsellors, Iudges and other graue personages, assenting and subscribing to the same, that Lady Iane daughter to Henry Duke of Suffolke should bee inuested and succeed him in the Emperiall Crowne: vnto whom therefore, and vnto none other, they must giue their loyall subiection, where also they put her in minde of the vnlawfull marriage and diuorse of her mother, her owne illegitimation, vncapable of Crowne, or rule of Dominions, willing her further to desist from any such claime, and to submit her selfe vnto Queene Iane now her Soueraigne, so would they hold amity with her, els should shee proone greeuous vnto them and her selfe, which letters were sent from the Tower of London the ninth of Iuly 1553. and subscribed by the hands of such as follow.

M. Fox Act.

(5) These Letters receiued, and the Lords mindes therein made knowne, shee forthwith remoued to Fremingham Castle, standing more safe from inuasion or easie accesse, vnto whom the Suffolke men were the first that resorted, offering their seruice vnto her rightfull cause, with condition they might still imbrace the Gospell in the same manner as King Edward had established it, to which she condiscended, though afterwards wearing the Diademe, and petitioned vnto for promise, shee both punished the Writer and answered their expectations, that they should one day well know, they being but members should not direct her their Head.

Iane Proclaimed Queene.

A.D. 1553. Iuly 10.

(6) The Lords at London to set their enterprise vpon foot, by proclamation made knowne in most parts of the City, the death of King Edward, and that by Will, hee had bequeathed his Crowne and Dominions, to the vertuous great Princesse, Lady Iane, daughter to Henrie Duke of Suffolke (as wee haue said) and so was shee proclaimed by the name of Queene Iane, though many of the Commons wished it had beene Queene Mary; and for some words spoken to that purpose, one Gilbert Pot a seruant Vintner, vpon the Pillory lost both his eares. Vnto the aide of Lady Marie came the Earles of Sussex, Bath and Oxford the Lord Wentworth, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Henrie Iernyngham, Sir William Walgrane, with diuers others of Norfolke and Suffolke; yea and the Citizens of Norwich themselues, hauing certaine knowledge of King Edwards death, foorthwith proclaimed Marie for Queene, and presently sent her aide both of men and munition. The Lords then hearing of great preparations, meant by time to ouermatch her in power, and thereupon agreed that Henrie Duke of Suffolke their new Queenes Father should with an Army repaire into Norfolke, which thing was so greeuous vnto Lody Iane his daughter, that with flouds of teares shee obtained his stay.

Many Noble men come to aide Mary.

Mary Proclaimed Queene first in Norwich, Iulie 12.

(7) None then was held fitter to vndergoe this great businesse, then was the Duke of Northumberland, young Gilfords Father, (who besides his sonnes dignity vnto whom this new Queene was wife) his valiant parts and sufficiency to marshall an Army in Field had been often experienced in Scotland, & but lately among these people with whom hee was now to deale. The Duke thus appointed, began as it should seeme, to mistrust the worst, and thereupon freely vttered his minde to the Lords; willing them to be carefull at home, as hee would bee venturous abroad, for their cause was common, and all for the Queene. Hee with his (hee said) went now to venture their bodies to the bloody strokes of warre, their Families and Children left to the dispose of others, whom as he told them if they meant not faire plaie, he could not auoide as wel as any: thus much and more spoken to the like purpose, one of the Lords replied, and said: Your Grace (as I iudge) doth cast this doubt ouer farre, for which of vs all, can wash our hands cleane of this businesse, therefore it behoueth vs to bee resolute, as much as it doth you, and among them Arundel wished that he might goe with him.

The Duke of Northumberland assigned Lord Lieutenant for Queene Iane.

The feare of the Duke of Northumberland.

(8) All things in a readinesse, and his commission confirmed vnder the broad Seale of England; vpon the 14. of Iuly the Duke with sixe hundred men, accompanied with the Lord Grey, and others, set foorth of London, and tooke his way through Shordich where beholding the countenances of the people, he spake to the Lord Grey and said. The people, my Lord, preasse still to see vs, but not one of them bids vs God speede: the same day likewise Sir Iohn Gates went after the Duke, both of them making for New market, whither further supplies were promised to bee sent.

Holinsh.

Many presse, but none pray for successe.

(9) In the meane time the Lord Windsore, Sir Edmund Peckham, Sir Robert Drury, and Sir Edward Hastings raised the Commons of Buckinghamshire, proclaiming Queene Marie euer as they went, the like did Sir Iohn Williams of Tame, and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine in Oxfordshire, and so did Sir Thomas Tresham in the County of Northampton: these with many more made forward toward Norfolke, vnto whom many more ioined in the way: and as God and good hap brought it to passe, sixe tall Ships well manned that were appointed before Yarmouth to haue taken Lady Marie if shee had fled; were by foule weather driuen into the Hauen, where master Iermingham was raising for her, and taking a Boate to halle them, the Sea-souldiers demanded what he would haue, his answer was their Captaines, whereunto the Souldiers consented, threatning to throw them into the Sea, if they refused to serue Queene Marie: the Shippes thus gotten and their number augmented, their terror grew fearefull to the Lords in the Tower: whose Tenants began then likewise to draw backe, and deny them their aide: so that certaine of them would faine haue beene gone, if by any meanes they could haue escaped the Tower, which the Lord Treasurer assaied, but was brought backe againe about midnight.

The Lord Windsor Proclaimed Queene Mary.

Six Ships taken to serue Queene Marie.

(10) The

Fox Act. & Mon.

(10) The Duke of Northumberland in as great feare as any, tooke still his stations according to his Commission, sending still to the Lords for their promised supplies, betwixt whom were such posting of letters, such speeding to and fro, such outward faire promises, such inward priuie practises, such talking of the Souldiers, and such heart-burning of the people, as it was a world to see: and the rumour of Souldiers from all quarters daily resorting vnto Queene Marie, made the turmoile much the more.

Great feares among the people.

To leaue therefore nothing vnassaied that might support their newe made Queene Iane, the Councell commanded Doctor Ridley Bishop of London, to maintaine her cause in his Sermon made at Pauls Crosse, which hee did vpon Sunday the sixteenth of Iuly, but that neither working, nor the peoples affection drawne from the rightfull Successor, the Lords fell from the Duke, who then was in Burie; and in London proclaimed Lady Mary Queene.

The Bishop of London defendeth Ianes Title in his Sermon.

Queene Mary Proclaimed in London.

Iulie 19.

(11) This sudden alteration brought many sudden feares into the Dukes breast, whose onlie way, as he well saw, was to follow the streame, and now returning to Cambridge his Souldiers began to turne in affection, most of them forsaking his company, a few onely excepted, whose perils were deepely engaged with his, where to shew his forwardnesse for the aduancement of Marie, wanting both Trumpet and Herauld at hand, himselfe accompanied with the Maior, and the Marquesse of Northampton, in the Market place proclaimed her Queene: which done in token of ioy, hee threw vp his owne Cap. And thus the right reuerted to whom it belonged, wee will now addresse our stile to her dreadfull Raigne, wherein the Kingdomes story may seeme to be writ rather with blood then with inke, and the nursing mother, (as Queenes by the Prophet are termed and called) to forget the naturall affection due to her Subiects which in some sort may bee compared to the children of her wombe.

The Duke of Northumberlands Souldiers forsake him.

(12) Yet were her beginnings both milde and gentle, pardoning all offenders in case of Lady Iane; excepting the Duke of Northumberland, the onely doer, and Sir Iohn Gates, Captaine of the Guard, who was in Armes against her, with some few others that worthily suffered for that offence. The Duke (as is said) laying downe weapon, and himselfe proclaiming Queene Mary, was neuertheless arrested with Francis Earle of Huntington in the Kings College at Cambrige by a Seargeant at Armes, but letters being then sent from the Counsell, that euery man should be dismissed without further trouble, the Duke among them was also released.

The Duke himselfe Proclaimeth Queene Mary.

Reinsted.

(13) The next morning Henrie Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundel, came into Cambridge from the Queene, who entring his Chamber, the Duke at his feet fell vpon his knees, desiring him for Gods loue to considier his case, that had done nothing without warrant of him, and the Councell; my Lord, said Arundell, I am sent hither from the Queene to arrest you, and I, said the Duke, obey your arrest, yet I beseech your Lordship to vse mercy towards him whose Acts haue beene no more then was enioyned by commission, that sooner should you haue sought for, said the Earle, and thereupon committed him to guard, and left him to the mercy of the Queene.

The Duke of Northumberland arrested.

(14) The Duke then with his three sonnes Iohn, Ambrose and Henrie, the Earle of Huntington, Sir Andrew Dudley, the two Gates, Iohn and Henrie, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Doctor Sandes were conueied towards London, and brought to the Tower, where the Lord Gilford Dudley, and the Lady Iane his wife, from the high Title of Soueraignety were made subiect to deiected Prisoners miseries.

Lieftan. The Duke and others conueied the Tower.

(15) Queene Marie from Fremingham repaired towards London, being all the way saluted without any mislikes, sauing that many men feared the altering of Religion: at her entrance into the Tower were released Thomas Duke of Norfolke, who had laine there from the last of King Henry the eight, Edward Lord Courtney whom shee forthwith aduanced Earle of Deuonshire, Cuthert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, and Stephen Gardiner late Bishop of Winchester, by her then made Lord Chancellor of England, From the Marshal-sea was freed Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, and now againe restored by the deposing of Doctor Ridley, who for his Sermon lately made, was committed to the Tower; so likewise Doctor Scorie gaue place vnto Daye, in the Bishoprike of Chichester, Miles Couerdale vnto Wesie, in the Bishopricke of Exceter, and Iohn Hooper vnto Heath, in the Bishopricke of Worcester; who forthwith was committed to the Fleet, and Archbishop Cranmer, into the Tower; so roughly she began with the reformed Clergy, (how milde soeuer her other proceedings were) in whose disgrace, Doctor Bourne Chaplaine to Bonner, made a Sermon at Pauls Crosse which so offended his Hearers, that a Dagger was throwne at him, to his great danger, and such threats muttered by the people, as had not Master Bradford stepped vp in his roome, and perswaded the people vnto quietnesse, surely it had cost the Preacher his life: which caused the Crosse the next Sabath to bee gaurded by the Queenes Guard, whilst the Preacher spake there to the people.

A Dagget throwne at D. Bourne. August. 13.

Pauls Crosse guarded in the time of the Sermon.

(16) This moued Queene Marie to put forth a Proclamation against those Preachers, and printed bookes; which any wise pointed towards the disgrace of the Papall See, the teinture whereof had stuck in her own breast euer since her infancie; and so much was shee deuoted to that of Rome, as being often mooued by King Edward, her brother, to imbrace the Gospel according to Lawes in his time established, with promise of her aduancement, by matching her in Marriage with Don Lewis the brother of Portingall, her answer was, shee had rather to forgoe all earthly preferments, and to loose all her Lands, and other Liuings, then to change her receiued opinion of her sure setled Religion.

Reported in a Letter of conference with her had by the Lord Chancellor and Secretary Peters.

(17) Her entrance thus standing, and State nothing safe (as shee thought) whilest the Duke of Northumberland (a Protestant) and other his Complices (for the most part in durance) were aliue, their arraignement were hastened, and deaths not long after lingred, which they suffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, where the Duke hauing promise of life, if he would recant his profession, Dastard-like with Peter, forsooke his master, and exhorted the people to the Romish profession: which his death Sermon afterwards by authority, came foorth in Print. With him suffered Sir Iohn Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer much more constant as appeared by their speech.

(18) The way (saith Master Foxe) thus made by blood, Queene Marie passed through London vnto Westminster to receiue the Crowne, which was solemnly set on her Head by Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, for that both the Archbishops were prisoners in the Tower: when a pardon was also published for many offences, which notwithstanding were so followed by them in Commission, as some were fined, some lost their Fees, some cast into Prison, and some depriued of all their estates.

(19) The next that felt the calamities of those times, were the Lady Iane and the Lord Gilford Dudley her Husband, both innocent persons in that which their Fathers had done: Shee doubtlesse was a Lady of admirable gifts both in learning, religion, and humane knowledge, as by her conference with Feckenam, letters to an Apostata, exhortation to her Sister, and praiers by her made in most feeling manner, doe euidently appeare, and that shee was constrained to consent to the things done is manifest by a letter sent to her father a little before her death; wherein, after a holy and dutifull exhortation vnto patience, shee vseth this Speech. My deare Father (if I may without offence reioice in mine owne miss-haps) me seemes in this I may account my selfe blessed, that washing my hands with the innocencie of my fact, my guiltlesse blood may crie before the Lord, mercie, mercie, to the innocent. And yet though I must acknowledge, that being constrained, and as you wot well enough, continually assailed, in taking vpon me, I seemed to consent, and therein offended the Queene and her Lawes: yet doe I assuredlie trust that this mine offence towards God is much the lesse, in that being in so roiall estate as I was, mine inforced honour neuer agreed with mine innocent heart.

Lady Iane and Lord Guilford condemned.

(20) Yet must the Law for so great an offence take place, for triall whereof this late titled Queene, and now miserable Lady, was brought into Guildhall in London, where shee with the Lord Guilford, Archbishop Cranmer, and the Lord Ambrose Dudley, were arraigned and condemned. But Cranmer (as Fox saith) was acquit of Treason, and stood onely in the case of Doctrine, which then was accounted Heresie, and so againe were returned to the Tower, for whom great lamentations were made, especially for the good Lady Iane, whose state the Queene herselfe so pitied, as that shee had the liberty of the Tower to walke in the Queenes Garden, and on the Hill; and surely had not her Father after his first offence fallen into another, shee had beene (as was thought) pardoned of life.

The Duke of Suffolke setteth himselfe against Queene Maries marriage.

(21) His second offence was, that whereas Queene Mary had a purpose to marry with the Spaniard, and to that ende embraced the Suite of Philip, the sonne of Charles the Emperour, many aswell Nobles as others disliked the Match, fearing not only the change of Religion, wherunto many of them stood very wel affected, but euen of the Lands seruitude vnto strangers, as was likely to happen, both in the Husband and Issue. To preuent which this Henry Duke of Suffolke but lately pardoned of life, secretly departed vnto Leicester and Warwickeshires, making Proclamations for the abandoning of Strangers, and instigated the People to withstand the Queenes marriage agreed vpon with Philip.

(22) These stirres thus abroach, the Earle of Huntington was sent into those parts, who taking Couentree (which Citie Suffolke thought himselfe sure of) forelaid the Countrey in such wise, as the Duke for his best refuge committed himselfe to the trust and secret keeping of a seruant of his, called Vnderwood, remaining in Asheley Parke, who against the trust reposed treacherously betraied him, and his brother Iohn Lord Grey, vnto the Earle; whence presently by him they were conuaied Prisoners vnto the Tower of London, their other brother Lord Thomas escaping in the dead of the night, was presently apprehended in the borders of Wales, and from thence was brought Prisoner to London.

(23) This (I say) seemed to hasten the death of those innocents, whom their Fathers had doubly brought into danger, for the Statists of those times, knowing their Queene could haue no quiet whilest these great oppolits were reared against her, held it best pollicy to take them away, whereupon the twelfth of February and first day of the weeke, Lord Guilford Dudley was had to the Scaffold vpon Tower Hill, and there with praiers and great pennancie ended his life: whose body all bloody laid in a Cart together with the Head wrapped in a cloth was brought into the Chappell within the Tower, euen in the sight of this sorowfull Lady, a spectacle more deadly then was the Ax of her death. And now her own part next to be acted, the Stage of her Tragedy was raised vpon the greene, within the Tower, wherein being mounted with a cheerefull countenance, and a patient minde, these words with great constancy she spake at that present.

The speech of Lady Iane at her death.

(24) Good people, I am come to die, and by "Law I am condemned to the same, my offence a-"gainst the Queenes Highnesse was onely in con-"sent to the deuise of others, which now is deemed "Treason: yet it was neuer of my seeking, but by "counsell of those who should seeme to haue fur-"ther vnderstanding of things then I, which knew "little of the Law, and much lesse of Titles to the "Crowne. But touching the procurement and de-"sire thereof by mee, or on my behalfe, I doe wash "my hands in innocency thereof before God, and "the face of you all this day: And therewith shee wrung her hands wherein she had a Booke. I pray you "all good Christian people (said shee) to beare "mee witnesse that I die a true Christian woman, "and that I looke to be saued by none other meanes "but onely by the mercy of God, in the blood of "his onely sonne Iesus Christ, and I confesse that "when I did know the word of God, I neglected the "same, and loued my selfe and the world, and there-"fore this plague and punishment is iustly and wor-"thily happened vpon me for my sinnes, and yet I "thanke God of his goodnesse, that hee hath giuen "me a time and respite to repent. And now good "people while I am aliue, I pray you assist me with "your praiers.

(25) Then kneeled shee downe, and said in English the fifty one Psalme: and againe standing vp, gaue her booke to Master Bridges, then Lieutenant of the Tower: then vntying her Gowne, the executioner offered to helpe, whom shee desired to forbeare, and so turning to her two Gentlewomen was disrobed of that, and her other Attires. This done, the Headsman kneeled downe and askt her forgiuenesse, vnto whom shee said, the Lord forgiue thee, and I doe; and I pray thee dispatch mee quickely, and kneeling againe, said will you take it off before I lye downe? hee answered, no Madam. Then she tied a Hand-kercher ouer her eies, and feeling for the blocke said, where is it, where is it? lastly laying her Necke vpon the same stretched foorth her body and said, Lord Iesus into thy hands I commend my spirit; which was scarsely vttered before shee receiued the fatall stroake of the Axe: and thus ended the life of this chaste, innocent, and most vertuous Lady: whose case through the seuerity of the Law adiudged accordingly, yet was her death much lamented of al, but most especially greeuous vnto him that gaue the sentence of the same, euen Iudge Morgan, who thereupon presently fell madde, and in his rauings continually cryed, take away the Ladie Iane from me, and in that horror shortly ended his life. I will not auouch that shee was with childe at the day of her death, though it was so reported, but rather iudge a more Christian-like proceeding against so great a person, though the time (as we well know) proued very bloody.

Henry Duke of Suffolke and L. Thomas Grey beheaded.

(26) Eleuen daies after her death, her Father Henry Duke of Suffolke, was executed vpon the Tower hill, euen the twenty three of February where hee most Christianly made profession of his Faith, and with great repentance of his fact receiued the stroke of death; and the three and twenty of Aprill following, his brother the Lord Thomas Grey suffered death in the same place.

(27) That the intended marriage with Philip of Spaine, was the cause of their last insurrection wee haue said; to perswade which, how eloquently soeuer had beene deliuered by Stephen Gardiner, Lord Chancellour, vnto the Nobility in the Chamber of Presence, setting forth the honour, the riches, and augmentation of Titles to the Crowne, and Kingdome of England: yet was it distastiue to most of their Stomackes, in so much that combinations were made against the processe, and many in many places vp in Armes: whereof Sir Thomas Wyat of Kent, was the first, and that vpon this occasion.

Queene Mary's marriage distastiue to many of the Nobles.

Sir Thomas Wyats stirre.

(28) Among many dislikers of the Queenes marriage it chanced, one, for some other offence, to be committed to the Fleet by the Councell, who being an inward acquaintance of Wyates, was supposed by him to haue reuealed the conspiracy; wherupon he put himselfe in action, before the enterprise was altogether ripe, and accompanied with Thomas Isleie, and others, at Maidstone in Kent, published a

Pro-

Proclamation against the Queenes marriage, alleadging the thraldome whereunto the Land would become subiect, by that Spanish match, and from Maidstone accompanied with Sir George Harper hasted to Rochester, where they forthwith brake downe the Bridge.

(29) In the meane-while Sir Henry Isleie, Anthonie and William Knevet, brethren, in East, and West Kent, perswaded the people (who were willing ynough) to take part with Wyat, for at Milton, Christopher Roper, in making Proclamation for the Queen, assisted by Master Tuck and Darrell, both Iustices of Peace, were all three taken and conueyed vnto Rochester, and there retained Prisoners by Sir Thomas Wyat, whereupon Sir Robert Southwell high Sheriffe of Kent, with the Lord Aburgauenny and others, vpon the market day at Malling in a penned Oration exhorted the hearers from such seditious enterprizes. On the other side Sir Henrie Isleie at Tunbridge, proclaimed the said Lord, the Sheriffe and their adherents, Traitors to God and the Crowne. Thus was Kent diuided, and preparations made to maintaine the faction, according as the Gentlemen stood diuersly affected.

(30) The Lord of Aburgauenny with the Sherif, and others, hearing that Sir Henry Isleie, and the two Knevets, conductors of fiue hundred Welshmen, meant their March vnto Rochester, to ioine with Wyat against the Duke of Norfolke, who was then come to Gravesend with fiue hundred Londoners in the quarrell of the Queene, to intercept that designe earely the next morning, they marched with many Kentish yeomen vnto Barrow-greene, a place that lay directly in their passage to Rochester, where ordering their men staied the approach of the Enemy: who seeing themselues thus forelaid, turned secretly aside into another by-way, and gotten vnto Wrotham-hill supposing they had beene quit of all danger, displaied their Ensignes.

(31) The Queenes friends thus defeated, were in a maruellous rage, & hasting forward ouertooke Sir Henry, & the two Knevets before they could ascend the height of the Hill, where presently began a most hot skirmish, many wounds giuen, & many Prisoners taken, till lastly the seditious were scattered, and fled; Sir Henry Isleie into Hampshire, and others into other parts, a few escaping to ioyne with their Consorts.

(32) The beginning thus vnfortunate, made many to misdoubt of the end, among whom Sir George Harper got from Wyat, and submitted himselfe to the Duke of Norfolke, who with Sir Henry Iernigham Captaine of the guard, Sir Edward Bray, Sir Iohn Fog and others, vpon Monday the twenty seauen of Ianuary, came vnto Strood neere Rochester, and there being busied in planting of his Ordinance, was certainely told that the Londoners meant to betray him: whereat sore astonied and turning about, he saw Captaine Bret, and the band of white Coates at his backe, crying, 'we are all Englishmen, we are all Englishmen': which suddaine conspiracy caused the Duke and the Captaine of the Guard, to shift for themselues, and left their vnfaithfull followers, to the disposse of their owne affections vnto Wyat; among whom Sir George Harper lately receiued of the Duke, lightly turned againe vnto Wyat. This Duke (saith Grafton) being an aged man, and fortunate before in all his warres, vpon this distasture impressed such dolour of mind, that for verie griefe thereof he liued not long after.

(33) Wyat, and his associates greatly incouraged by this new supply, with eight brasse Peeces taken of the Queenes, besides other of their owne, marched the next morning vnto Cowling Castle, where the Lord Cobham then lay, and bending these Ordinance against the Gate, brake it open with their shot, and made entrance for their men. The Lord Cobham right valiantly resisted their doings, and bestowed freely such small munition as he had, against their breasts, euen with his owne hands: in which enterprize two of his men were slaine, and Wyat after some talke had with the said Lord departed vnto Gravesend, where hee with his men were lodged that night.

(34) The next day hee came vnto Dartford, whither resorted Sir Edward Hastings Master of the Horse, and Sir Thomas Cornwallis Knights, both of them being priuie Counsellors to the Queene. Their comming signified. Sir Thomas Wyat with certaine Gentlemen went forth to meet them, Wyat somewhat marching before the rest with a partizan in his hand, at whose approach Sir Edward Hastings alighted, and spake vnto him as followeth:

Two priuie Counsellors sent vnto Wyat.

Sir Edward Hastings message to Wyat. Hollinsh.

" (35) The Queenes Maiesty requireth to vnder-
" stand the true cause, wherefore you haue gathe" red in Armes her liege people against her, which is
" the part of a Traitor, and yet in your Proclamati-
" ons you call your selfe a true Subiect, both which " cannot stand together. I am no Traitour (quoth Wyat) and the cause why I haue assembled the people, is to defend the Realme from danger of being ouerrunne by Strangers, which must needes follow, if the marriage take place. Why said the Counsellors, there is no stranger yet come, either for power or number whom you need to suspect, therefore if that thing onely be the quarrell, will you that dislike the marriage, come to communication touching the cause, and the Queene is content you shall be heard. To that I yeeld said Sir Thomas Wyat; but for my further surety, I will rather bee trusted then trust, and thereupon demanded (as some haue written saith Hollinshed) the Custody of the Tower and her Grace within it, as also the displacing of some Counsellors about her, and to place other in their Roomes: To " which the Master of the Horse replied: Wyat, be" fore thou shalt haue thy traiterous demand gran" ted, thou shalt die and twenty thousand with thee, and so these Agents departed to the Court, and Wyat forthwith came vnto Deepeford by Greenewich.

Sir Thomas Wyats answere.

February 1.

(36) At whose approach so neere London, such feares were possessed, that besides those in the Court (who instigated the Queene to remoue into the Tower) the Lord Maior, Aldermen, and most of the Citizens were in Armour, and the Sergeants and Lawyers at Westminster Hall pleaded their causes in Harnesse, at which time it was no need to bid the Spanish Ambassadors be gone, who no more standing to woo for their master, made away by water as fast as they could: and yet some comfort was conceiued by the certaine newes of the discomfiture of the Carews and Gibs, that were making head in the West wholly defeated, and fled: which was proclaimed in London vpon Candlemas Eue: vpon the day of that feast Queene Mary to make the City sure on her side, came vnto the Guild-Hall, accompanied with many Courtiers, whither likewise were assembled the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, and the chiefe Citizens in their Liueries: the Queen being placed and all men attending her pleasure, with verie good grace, and words well vttered, shee spake in effect as heere insueth.

Great feares among the people.

"this I ſay further vnto you in the word of a "Prince, I cannot tell how naturally a mother lo-

"as naturally loue the Subiects, as the mother doth

"together in the knot of concord, wee ſhall be able
"I doubt not, to giue theſe rebels a ſhort and ſpeedy

"doubt not but with Gods grace to bee able to "liue ſo ſtill. But if (as my Progenitors haue done
"before,) it might pleaſe God that I might leaue
"ſome fruit of my body to be your Gouernour, I
"truſt you would not onely reioyce thereat, but alſo
"I know it would be to your great comfort: and cer"tainly if I either did know or thinke, that this mar"riage ſhould either turne to the danger or loſſe of "any of you my louing Subiects, or to the detriment
"of any part of the roial Eſtate of this Engliſh Realm,
"I would neuer conſent thereunto, neither would I
"euer marry whilſt I liued. And in the word of a
"Queene, I promiſe and aſſure you, that if it ſhall
"not probablie appeare before the Nobility and "Commons in the high Court of Parliament, that "this marriage ſhalbe for the ſingular benefit and "commoditie of the whole Realme, that then I will
"abſtaine not onely from this marriage, but alſo
"from any other. Wherefore good Subiects plucke
"vp your hearts, and like true men ſtand faſt with "your lawfull Prince againſt theſe Rebels, both ours
"and yours, and feare them not, for (I aſſure you) I
"doe not: and will leaue with you my Lord Howard,
"and my Lord Treaſurer to bee Aſſiſtant with my

"bellious Company.

(37) The Oration ended, and the Citizens well pleaſed, Queene Marie with good content returned to the Court, where conferring with her Councell, ſhee ordained the Lord William Herbert Earle of Pembrooke generall of the Field, and gaue forth by Proclamation, that whoſoeuer could bring Wyat either quicke or dead, ſhould be rewarded with an hundreth pound Lands by yeere, to him and his poſterity for euer.

The Earle of Pembrooke made Lord Generall. R. Graſton.

(38) Wyat in Depford, and knowing what was done, with foureteene Enſignes, and foure thouſand ſtrong, vpon Saturday the third of February marched towards London, at whoſe approach, the white Tower hauing him in dãger ſhot off her Ordinance, but did miſſe their marke, ſome leuelling too farre ouer, and ſome as much too ſhort. His entrance into Southwarke was peaceable and without all reſiſtance, though many Country men were therein beſtowed to withſtand his comming, who contrary to truſt, ioyned with the Kentiſh, and then to winne the hearts of the people, he preſently made Proclamation that no Souldier ſhould take away anie thing without due payment, and the parties conſent: notwithſtanding Wincheſter houſe ſoone felt the contrarie, whoſe goods were ranſacked, the Bookes in the Librarie cut and defaced, and not a lock left vpon the doores: ſuch ſpoiles inſurrections euer ayme at, how faire ſoeuer they foyle the glaſſe to the ſight.

(39) The Suburbs thus his; he aſſured himſelfe the City likewiſe ſhortly would be, but comming to the Bridge, he found the Gates faſt ſhut, neither any in haſt to open them for him, therefore making a trench at the Bridge-foote, planted two peeces of Ordinance againſt the Gate: At Saint Georges Church he mounted another, the fourth at the entrance into Barmondſey ſtreete, and the fift towards the Biſhop of Wincheſters houſe.

The rebels ſpoile Wincheſter houſe.

Wyat fortifieth Southwarke. Iohn Stow.

(40) Within the City the Lord Maior, and Lord William Howard, cauſed the draw bridge to bee cut downe, and making fortifications for their defence, placed great Ordinance againſt the entrance. Wyat ſtill thirſting to know the Cities intent, got with ſome few followers through the Porters lodge vnto the draw bridge, where being vnſeene himſelfe, ſaw the paſſage too difficult to haue friendly acceſſe, and thereupon ſaid to his conſorts, this place is too hot for vs. Beſides the Tower began to be topped with Ordinance, ſeauen Culuerings and Demie Cannons, leuelled againſt the Bridgefoote, the Steples of Saint Olaues, and Saint Mary Oueries, all the White Tower laden with her peeces, three fauconets ouer the water-Gate, and a double Culuering vpon Diuelling Tower: and all theſe were turned and fearfully charged vpon the Borough of Southwarke, which ſeene, the Inhabitants with great lamentations came vnto Wyat, and complained, that for his cauſe they were like to be vtterly vndone; who ſtrucken with pittie and remorſe of ſo many, preſently remoued his Armie towards Kingſton vpon Thames, where finding the Bridge broken downe, with Ladders and Planks he ſoone repaired it, and ſo paſſing the riuer the ſame night, came to Braineford before hee was deſcried by the Queenes-Scoutes, the newes whereof ſore troubled the Court. Wyats hopes were to haue ſurprized the Citie vpon the ſuddaine, and therefore made ſuch haſt as he did, but being hindred by a Peece of great Ordinance that was diſmounted from the carriage, came not vnto Knights bridge before it was day.

downe the old lane directly towards Saint Iames, whence Captaine Vaughan with two Enſignes tooke towards Weſtminſter, and Wyat along the cauſey leading to Charing-Croſſe, the Lord Generals Horſemen, hitherto ſtood houering aloofe, vntill the enemy was paſſed, all but the taile, vpon which they violentlie ſet, and ſeuered from the reſt, the maine neuer looking backe to releeue their diſtreſſe.

Iohn Stow.

(42) From the higher ground, and along the high way the great Ordinance plaied, and Wyats againe anſwered the like, though with ſmall hurt to either, onely one from the Hill ſlew three of Wyats men in a rancke, and ſtracke through the Brickewall into the Parke. Wyat paſſing forward by the battell of footmen without any impeachement, came to Charing-Croſſe, where the Lord Chamberlaine and Sir Iohn Gage, ſtood ready to reſiſt him: but Kentiſh Souldiers ruſhing violently into the ſtreets, forced them into the gates of White-hall which preſentlie were ſhut, and a report in the Court that the Lord Generall was reuolted to Wyat, all ſo diſtracted that none durſt truſt others, and no other voice therein heard, but Treaſon, Treaſon. Meane while Wyat with ſuch ſmall company as hee had, haſted through Fleetſtreet, and came vnto Ludgate, where hee knocked to haue entrance, and well hoped of further aſſiſtance, but was farre deceiued, the gate being guarded againſt him, with a number of true Citizens and bands of the Queenes friends.

Wyat commeth to Ludgate.

(43) But thoſe ſtraglers that had taken into Weſtminſter, whereof Kneuet was Captaine, ſeeking to recouer their companions, came before the Court gates, and there made their ſtand, which being ſhutte againſt them ſhot many of their arrowes into the Garden, yea and into the windowes of White-hall, though without any hurt: from the Court thus guarded againſt them, they foorthwith departed, meaning to follow Wyat their Leader into London, and marching forward, were met with at Charing-Croſſe, by Sir Henry Iernyngham, Captaine of the Guard, Sir Edward Bray Maſter of the Ordinance, and Sir Philip Paris Knights, ſent thither by order of the Lord Generall, with a band of Archers, and certaine Field peeces to ſecure the Court, their Artillery diſcharged, they preſently ioine fight with the Rebels at puſhe of the Pike, who a while ſtucke to it manfully; in which conflict was the triall of the day: but as their quarrell was traiterous, ſo their hearts were ſoone quelled, each one ſauing himſelfe by flight, wherein about twenty of thoſe bemired Souldiers were ſlaine, and no other crie heard, but downe with the Daggletailes.

The conflict at Charing-Croſſe.

(44) Wiat returned from Ludgate, ſate downe vpon a ſtall againſt the common Inne called Belſauage, where he beganne (as it ſhould ſeeme) to expoſtulate what his heady raſhneſſe had done, and the vaine hopes hee had conceiued of the Citizens abetments, who ſeldome tooke part againſt the Crowne: he then deſpairing of further ſucceſſe, retired backe towards the Court, and was not ſtaied vntill hee came to Temple-Barre, where certaine Horſemen comming from the field, met him full in the face, betwixt whom began ſome bickering, till laſtly Clarentius King at Armes came to him and ſaid; Maſter Wyat you ſee the day is gone againſt you; and in reſiſting you can doe no good, but hazard the death of your Souldiers, and your ſelfe, to the great perill of your ſoule. My counſell is, that you were beſt to yeelde, and perchance you may finde the Queene mercifull, if you ſtay from further bloodſhed.

Wiat returneth from Ludgate.

(45) Wyat heereat ſomewhat aſtonied, ſeeing now his whole deſignes defeated (though his few Souldiers were bent ſtill to fight) anſwered the Herauld, Well then, If I muſt needes yeeld, I will yeeld to a Gentleman: to whom Sir Maurice Barkley came preſently and bad him mount his Horſe behinde, in like manner another tooke vp Sir Thomas Cobham, and the third Thomas Kneuet, and ſo carried them vnto the Court, whence in the afternoone, they with the two Mantels, and Alexander Bret, were committed to the Tower, Sir Thomas Wyat wearing a ſhirt of Male vnder a veluet Caſſocke, and the wind-lace of his Dagge hanging about his necke. The next day eleuen Gentlemen more of name and account, were likewiſe committed to the Tower. In London about fifty perſons were hanged for Wyats conſpiracie, and foure hundred more led through the Citie with halters about their neckes to Weſtminſter, where in the Tilt-yard they were all pardoned by the Queene, pronouncing her mercy from the Gallerie aboue.

Wyat yeeldeth himſelfe.

Febr. 8.

400 perſons pardoned by the Queene.

(46) But the Capitall offender Sir Thomas Wyat arraigned at Weſtminſter vpon caſe of high Treaſon, confeſſed the inditement and had iudgement of death accordingly, which he ſuffered vpon the Scaffold on Tower-hill the eleuenth of April following; his words to the people were theſe, "Good peo-"ple I am come hither preſently to die, being there-"to lawfully and worthily condemned, for I haue "ſore offended againſt God and the Queenes Maie-"ſty; I truſt God hath forgiuen mee, and will take "mercy vpon me; I beſeech the Queenes maieſty "alſo of forgiueneſſe (ſhee hath forgiuen you quoth "Doctor Weſton) let euerie man beware how hee ta-"keth any thing in hand againſt the higher powers, "vnleſſe God be proſperable to his purpoſe, it will "neuer take good effect or ſucceſſe, whereof you "may now learne by me, and I pray God I may be "the laſt example in this place. But where it is ſaid "and noiſed abroad, that I ſhould accuſe the Lady "Elizabeth and the Lord Courtney, it is not ſo, good "people: For I aſſure you, neither they, nor any o-"ther now yonder in hold was priuie to my riſing "before I began, as I haue declared no leſſe to the "Queenes Councell, and that is moſt true. Then ſaid Doctor Weſton, marke heere my maſters, he ſaith that, that which he hath ſhewed to the Councell in writing of them, is moſt true. Whereupon Wyat put off his Gowne, his dublet, and waſtcoate, and knitting a kercheife ouer his eies with moſt feruent praiers, receiued the ſtroke of the Axe.

Holinſhed. March 15.

Sir Tho. Wyat beheaded.

Wyats words at his death.

(47) Alexander Bret, and twenty two Kentiſh perſons beſides, were executed in diuers parts of that County: others were likewiſe arraigned for the ſame Conſpiracy, as Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, and Sir Iames Croft, the one quit by his Inqueſt, the other pardoned of life by the Queene. Many others were ſuſpected as aiders vnto Wyat, and his enterpriſe, among whom the Lord Courtney, and the Princeſſe Elizabeth, ſiſter to the Queene, were not the leaſt, and therefore both of them committed to the Tower: of which Ladies troubles, innocency, and truth, thus we find related.

Sir Nich. Throckmorton and Sir Iames Croft arraigned.

Lady Elizabeths troubles.

(48) Theſe Virgine Princes were not ſo neerely linked in blood and nature, as they were ſeparated aſunder in affecting Religion, and that being the prime cauſe for which theſe commotions were raiſed, Queene Mary much ſuſpected her ſiſter to bee a principall moouer therein. The ielouſie whereof, Gardiner of Wincheſter did further inflame, by blowing Coniectures into her eare: ſo that needes the Princeſſe muſt be ſent for, then lying ſicke at her Mannour of Aſbridge, euen the next day after that Wyat roſe. The meſſengers were, Sir Iohn Williams, Sir Edward Haſtings, and Sir Tohmas Cornwalles, all three Priuie Counſellors, with a troope of Horſemen in number two hundred and fifty.

Lady Elizabeth ſore ſicke is ſent for.

M. Fox Acts and Monuments. 1238.

(49) Theſe comming to Aſbridge at tenne in the night, ſuddenly aſcended into her Priuie Chamber, and making it knowne they came from the Queene, had preſent acceſſe into her Bed-Chamber; where the ſaid Lady lay very ſore ſicke: their firſt ſalutations were, that they were ſorry to ſee her in that eſtate, and I am not glad ſaid ſhe, to ſee you here at this time of the night; Madame, quoth they, our Meſſage requires haſte, and the Queenes pleaſure is, that you ſhall bee at London the ſeuenth of this moneth

The conference of the 3. Counſellors with Lady Elizabeth.

neth. No Creature gladder to come to her Maiesty then I (said Lady Elizabeth) being right sorry that I am not in case at this time to attend her Grace, as your selues heere see. Indeed (said they) for that we see, wee are heartily sorry, but our commission is, that we bring you to London either quicke or dead, whereat she being greatly amazed, sorrowfully said, she wel hoped their commissiō was nothing so strait, but they calling for two Doctors of Phisicke demanded whether shee might be remoued with life, and that being resolued, bad her prepare against the next morning, and so left this innocent Princesse very sore perplexed the rest of the night.

Lady Elizabeth as a prisoner conueied to the Court.

(50) The next morning approched, and shee in no better plight, notwithstāding was led forth more like a Prisoner then a Prince, which the people in euery place as she passed, did much lament, and strongly guarded, was so conueied vnto the Court, where for fourteene daies space, shee comfortlesse continued without sight of friend, the Queene or any Lords, those onely excepted that attended the dores, which were the Lord Chamberlaine, and Sir Iohn Gage.

Princes Elizabeth examined of treason.

(51) Vpon Friday before Palme Sunday, Gardiner of Winchester, and nine more of the Councell, came into her presence, and there charged her both with Wyats Conspiracy, and the stirres lately made in the West parts by Sir Peter Carew and others, which shee most constantly denyed: but in conclusion they told her it was the Queenes pleasure, that shee should forthwith goe to the Tower, the name of which dolefull prison strucke deepe to her heart. I trust (said shee) her Maiesty will be farre more gracious then to commit to that place a true and most innocent woman, that neuer had offended her in thought, worde nor deed. And thereupon instantly desired those Lords to bee a meane for her vnto the Queene: which some of them promised, and much pittied her case. But about an howre after, came foure of these Lords againe, namely, Winchester, the Treasurer, the Steward and Sussex: with a charge to discharge her of all attendants, sauing onely her Gentleman Vsher, three Gentlewomen, and two Groomes of her Chamber, the Guard was set to warde in the next roomes; two Lords with bands of men to watch in the Hall, and two hundred Northerne white Coates in the Garden, thus all was made sure, and she kept from starting.

The honourable parts of the Earle of Sussex.

(52) The next day came vnto her two Lords of the Councell with commandement from the Queen to haue her to the Tower, they roundly told her, her Barge was prepared, and that the tide would tarry for no body: this heauy newes encreased this distressed Ladies pensiuenesse, who in most humble wise became Petitioner vnto their Lordships, that shee might stay vntill the next tide, which as she wel hoped, would proue more comfortable; but the one of them being more forward in his Commission then the other, flatly told her that neither tide nor time should bee delaied. Whereupon her Grace desired shee might write to the Queene: he againe answered, that hee durst not suffer it, neither in his iudgement was it conuenient: but the other more milder (which was the Earle of Sussex) kneeling down told her that her Grace should haue liberty to write her mind: swearing as hee was a true man, himselfe would deliuer it into the Queenes hand, and bring her the answere, whatsoeuer came of it: which honourable permission was then most thankefully taken, and afterward most highly esteemed in her Princely fauours towards that honourable man; but in writing this letter or petition to the Queene, the Tide was turned, and serued not to shoot the bridge with a Barge; therefore it was priuily determined to take the aduantage of the next, which with better aduisement was againe deferred, for that it fell about midnight, whence rose a feare that she might bee forceably taken from them before shee came to the Tower: and so with great prouidence was that danger preuented.

Lady Elizabeth carried prisoner vnto the Tower.

(53) The next day being Palme Sunday, serued well for their purpose, when as vnder pretext of deuotion, the Citizens of London were commanded to carry their Palmes to the Church, whilest her Barge might be passed by without sight or any suspect. And to that purpose the foresaid two Noble men about nine of the Clocke repaired vnto her, shewing that the time was now come, that her Grace must goe to the Tower; to which shee answered, the Lords will be done, I am contented: seeing it is the Queenes mind: and comming into the Garden to take Barge, shee cast her eyes towards euery Window, hoping to see some that would pitty her case, but that also failing, she sighed and said, I maruell what the Nobility meane to suffer me a Prince to be led into Captiuity, the Lord knowes whither, for my selfe doe not.

The seuere and hard dealings against the Princes Elizabeth.

(54) Great haste was made to the barge, and asmuch to get by London vnseene: but the tyde yong and not fully come in, the fall of the water at the Bridge was so great, as the Bargemen themselues feared to passe thereunder, and motioned a stay till the streame were more leuell, which in no wise wold bee heard: whereupon they passed the Arch with such danger, as the sterne of the boate strucke against the ground; and come to the staires, could not take land without stepping into the water, which this tender, and newly recouered Princesse was forced to doe, in which passage she vttered these words: I speake before thee O God, hauing none other friend but thee onely; here landeth as true a subiect, being prisoner, as euer landed at these staires; to which the seuerall Lords answered, if it were so, it was the better for her. Shee come into the gate, a great number of Seruants and Warders of the Tower stood to guard her, through whome as shee passed, the poore men kneeling downe with one voice, desired God to preserue her Grace, whereof some were rebuked, and others put from their Ordinarie the next day.

The constant patience of Lady Elizabeth.

(55) Then passing somewhat further both faint and vncomfortable, shee rested her selfe vpon a cold stone, to whom M. Bridges the Lieutenant then being said: Madam, you were best to come out of the raine, for you sit vnwholesomely; to whome shee replyed, better sitte here then in a worse place, for God knoweth, and not I, whither you will bring me: at which her sorrowfull and deiected answere, her Gentleman Vsher, a seruant most loyall and louing to his Mistresse, among many others brake forth into flouds of teares, the witnesses commonly of al inward griefe, which the Princes perceiuing, reproued, demanding what hee meant so to discourage her, seeing shee tooke him to bee her Comforter, & especially knowing her truth to be such, as that no man should haue any cause to weepe for her.

The Earle of Sussex most first for Lady Elizabeth.

(56) Shee safelie bestowed, and the dores made fast with lockes and bolts, was there comfortlesse left in the dolefull prison, where calling for her booke and her few seruants about her, shee fell vnto prayers, desiring God to prosper her worke, that she might build vpon the rocke Christ: whereby these blustring tempests thus sodainely risen might not preuaile against her foundation. Meanewhile the Lords were as circumspect, how shee might be kept sure; many among them propounded, that it was most needfull shee should bee close prisoner, and a strong guard set to watch her dore; against which the Lord Sussex replyed and said: My Lords let vs take heede wee goe not beyond our Commission, shee was our Kings Daughter, and if wee know the Prince next in blood, therefore let vs so deale with her now, that if it so happen, we may answere our doings vnto her another day.

Lady Elizabeth commanded to haue Masse in her lodgings.

(57) Two dayes spent thus in the Tower, and Gods diuine seruice celebrated in English, it was commanded to haue Masse in her lodgings; and to that end two of her yeomen were appointed to answere the Priest, which was as vnwillingly done, as the

the deuotion was small. Then were the fauourites examined, yea and * some of them with torture, & all to finde a fitte knife to cut her innocent throate, that so Winchester might wash his white Rochet in her purple blood; who being Lord Chancellor and Ruler of the reſt, came into the Tower to examine her himſelfe, with ſome others of the Queens Councell: Shee then brought before them, was demanded of the talke ſhee had with Sir Iames Croft (a priſoner in the Tower, and then brought to her preſence) concerning her remouing from Aſbridge vnto Dunnington Caſtell: My Lords (ſaid ſhee) mee thinks you doe mee wrong to examine euery mean Priſoner againſt me, if they haue done euill let them anſwere for it, I pray you ioyne mee not with ſuch offenders; as touching my remoue to Dunnington, mine officers, and you Sir Iames Croft can tell; but what is this to the purpoſe, might I not, my Lords, goe to mine owne houſes at all times? whereunto the Lord of Arundell kneeling downe, anſwered that her Grace ſaid truth, and that himſelfe was ſorry to ſee her troubled about ſuch vaine matters: well my Lords (ſaid ſhee) you ſift mee narrowly, but you can doe no more then God hath appointed, vnto whom I pray to forgiue you all.

(58) No fault appearing, nor offence found, yet was ſhee ſtill retained in that cloſe and ſorrowfull priſon, and for want of freſh aire, her health beganne to bee empaired, whereupon the Lord Shandoys one of her Keepers, obtained that ſhee might walke into the Queenes lodgings, the windowes being ſhut onely in preſence of himſelfe, the Lord Chamberlaine, and three of the Queenes Gentlewomen ſent her for the ſame purpoſe; which fauour was further increaſed by libertie to walke into the Garden, the other priſoners commanded not ſo much as to looke into the place while her Grace remained therein.

(59) During which time there vſually repaired vnto her a little boy, about foure yeeres of age (a mans ſonne of the Tower) in whoſe pretty pratling ſhee tooke great pleaſure; his vſe was to bring her flowers, and to receiue at her hands ſuch thinges as commonly pleaſe Children: which laſtly brought a great ſuſpition into the Lord Chamberlaines working head, that by this Child letters were brought betwixt the Prince Elizabeth, and the L. Courtney, whereupon the boy was threatned, and his father commanded not to ſuffer him any more to reſort to her Grace: which notwithſtanding, the next day hee did, but the dore being ſhut, and hee peeping through a hole, cried vnto her, Miſtreſſe I can bring you no more flowers now.

(60) It was reported (ſaith Fox) if the relation be true, that a Writte ſubſcribed vnder certaine Councellors hands, was directed for the preſent death of the Lady Elizabeth, which hee doth wholy impute vnto Winchesters working: This ſodaine charge giuen for her preſent execution, ſore grieued M. Bridges then Lieutenant of the Tower, who forthwith repaired vnto the Queene, to know her further pleaſure therein: but ſhee being altogether ignorant of any ſuch warrant, blamed the doers and gaue a contrary command, whereby was preſerued the life of her ſiſter: which howſoeuer (to the diſtaſture of her enemies) it was prolonged, yet her State of liues ſecurity ſeemed little better, and her feares preſently conceiued, were nothing the leſſe: for the Conſtable diſcharged, Sir Henry Benifield a more ſeuere Iaylor was placed in his roome, who with an hundred Souldiers in blew coates entred vpon his charge: at ſight whereof the fearefull Princes demanded, whether the Scaffold whereon Lady Iane ſuffered was ſtill ſtanding: or whether Sir Henry (a man to her altogether vnknowne) made any conſcience of murther, if hers was committed vnto his charge.

(61) The nineteenth of May her Grace was remoued from the Tower towards Woodſtocke, Sir Henry Benifield being her conductor, vnto whome Sir John Williams Lord Tame was ioined in Commiſſion. The firſt night ſhee was brought vnto Richmond, where all her owne ſeruants were remoued from her preſence, and the raſcall Souldiers ſet to attend her perſon; by which ſeuere beginnings ſhe much doubted that her dayes were nere ſpent, and in that place her life muſt take end: whereupon calling together her ſeruants deſired them to pray for her, for this night (ſaid ſhee) I thinke I muſt die; which lamentable wordes drew fountaines of teares out of their eyes; and thereupon her Gentleman Vſher went downe vnto the Lord Tame in the Court, deſiring him vnfainedly to ſhew, whether his Lady and Miſtreſſe that night were in danger of death, whereby himſelfe and fellowes might take ſuch part as God would appoint. Mary God forbid quoth the Lord Tame, that any ſuch wickednesſe ſhould bee intended, which rather then it ſhould bee wrought, I and my men will die at her foot.

(62) With no greater comfort proceeded ſhe towards Woodſtocke: Sir Henry her Iaylor (as ſhe termed him) euer carrying ſo hard an hand in his Commiſſion; for the people that with teares preſſed to meet her in the paſſage, and with prayers ſaluted her in moſt louing manner, he both threatned, & draue backe, calling them Traitors and Rebels againſt the Queene and her Lawes, and whereas in certaine villages bels were rung as ſhee paſſed for ioy as they conceiued it of her deliuerance, Sir Henry Benifielde tooke the matter ſo diſtaſtfull, that hee commanded the bels to ſurceaſe, and ſet the ringers thereof in the ſtockes; ſo that not without cauſe this louing Lady ſent this word vnto her poore ſeruants, and well wiſhing friends, Tanquam ouis, as a ſheepe to the ſlaughter, ſo am I lead: And ſurely had not the L. Tame bin more comfortable in his place vnto this diſtreſſed Princeſſe, her ſpirite of hopes had been ſpent before the conduction of her perſon had beene accompliſhed.

(63) Neither in Woodſtocke was her liberty much enlarged, nor feares any leſſe, ſhee being incloſed in none of the beſt lodgings, garded with Soldiers both day and night, and although ſhee had leaue into ſome Gardens, yet were fiue or ſixe lockes betwixt her walke and her lodgings, and all made faſt after her entrance. It was alſo ſuſpected that the Keeper of Woodſtocke a notorious Ruffian was inſtigated to kill this innocent Princes, as alſo that one Baſſet a Darling of Biſhoppe Gardiners came to Bladenbridge a mile from Woodſtocke, accompanied with twentie men in priuy Coates, earneſtly deſiring to ſpeake with Lady Elizabeth, pretending ſecret and importunate buſineſſe: but Sir Henry her Keeper gone to the Court had giuen ſtrait charge to his brother, that none ſhould haue acceſſe vnto her before his returne, though they came from the Councell or Queene her ſelfe. Whereby that deſigne was happily loſt. What his errand was I will not determine, but others haue conceiued it was for no good.

(64) Another accident alſo hapned, whether of purpoſe, or otherwiſe I cannot ſay, but ſurely it was to the danger of her life: for on the ſodain her lodgings were on fire, which beganne to kindle betwixt the boardes and ſeeling vnder the Chamber where ſhee lay, and was vehemently miſtruſted to be purpoſely done. Theſe and the like feares daily happning, drew the diſtreſſed Princes into many paſſions, wherof one is reported, that ſhee ſitting ſolitary at her Priſon-window, chanced to ſee a Maide of Woodſtocke in the Parke milking of Kine, and as ſhee ſate, merily to ſing ouer her Pale, which ſtrucke this ſad penſiue Priſoner into a deepe meditation, preferring the Maides fortunes farre aboue her owne, and heartily wiſhed that her ſelfe were a Milke-maid, into ſuch diſtreſſe was her princely birth brought, in which comfortleſſe thraldome, wee will a while leaue her, & return to ſpeak of matters in the Court.

(65) Queene Mary being now chiefe Pilot her ſelfe, and ſet at the helme of all Soueraign power, ſteered the ſterne of her zealous affections, according to her owne liking; when preſently vpon her Coronation beganne a Parliament at Weſtminſter, & a Conuocation in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in London, where ſhee commanded a free diſputation for Religion, without any danger of offence. The Queſtions to bee controuerſed, were concerning a Catechiſme ſet forth in King Edwards dayes, and the preſence of Chriſt in the Sacrament of his Supper. For Popiſh Tranſubſtantiation ſtood Diſputers Doctor Moreman, Doctor Watſon, Doctor Chedſey, Maiſter Harpſfield; and Maſter Morgan, D. Weſton Dean of Weſtminſter apointed for Prolocutor: For Chriſts ſpirituall preſence were M. Haddon, M. Elmar, M. Cheyney, M. Philpot, and Maſter Perne, theſe meeting 6 ſeueral daies diſputed only vpon the laſt queſtion: but with ſuch diſagreement, as laſtly Q. Mary commanded Boner to diſſolue the aſſembly, without any Subſcriptions to the aſſertions premiſed.

(66) And not long after Thomas Cranmer Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, Nicholas Ridley Biſhoppe of London, and Hugh Latimer ſometimes Biſhoppe of Worceſter, were ſent from the Tower of London vnto Oxford, to diſpute vpon the ſaide Argument againſt Doctor Treſham, Doctor Cole, Doctor, Ogletherpe Doctor Pie, Maſter Harpſfeild, and Maſter Feckenam, all Oxford men, vnto whom from Cambridge were ioyned Doctor Yonge, Doctor Glinne, Doctor Seton, Doctor Watſon, Doctor Sedgewicke, and Doctor Atkinſon, Doctor Weſton again being Prolocutor: the diſputation beganne vpon the ſixteenth of Aprill, and ended the twentieth of the ſame moneth, with the ſentence of thoſe three Biſhoppes deaths, which through fire gaue teſtimony of their faithes, a yeere and ſixe moneths after in the Towne Ditch of Oxford: whoſe diſputations, letters, and laſt endes, are largely ſet down by M. Iohn Fox in his Acts and Monuments of the Church, vnto whom I refer the deſirous Reader, leſt by enlarging of thē, the courſe of our temporall Story ſhould bee ouermuch interrupted with matters Eccleſiaſticall of thoſe ſorrowfull times.

(67) Queene Mary intending her marriage with Spaine, great feares were conceiued that many calamities would follow, aſwell to the Church, reformed from abuſes, as for the politicke proceedings of the Kingdomes affaires; which as ſome tooke was prognoſticated euen from heauen it ſelfe, by a Raine-bow reuerſed, the bow turned downward, & the two ends ſtanding vpward, as alſo by two Suns ſhining at one time, and a good diſtance aſunder in the Skies, both which ſights appeared in London the fifteenth of February.

Fox Act. & Mon. p.1637.

(68) In which City a Parliament to that purpoſe was aſſembled, wherein by Statute the marriage was confirmed, though with no leſſe liking of thoſe times obſeruers, then was the marriage deſired which is fained of the Sunne: to hinder whoſe purpoſe, the world is ſaid to haue made ſuite vnto Iupiter, leſt hauing more Sunnes then one, the whole frame of the Globe ſhould bee ſet on fire. Theſe diſtaſtiue ſtomackes Queene Mary well perceiued, therefore to giue them content, ſhee wrote her letters into the Weſt, and to Wales, charging the Lord Preſident, the Biſhoppes of Oxford and Salisbury, to intimate the benefite thereof to the whole land, as much as might bee; neither was London forgotten, whoſe Lord Maior and Commons were ſent for to the Court, and there by the Lord Chancellor tolde how by this match all the Realm would bee enriched, but eſpecially London by their trade and trafficke with Spaine.

4 That the Iſſue proceeding of this marriage either male or female in the right of their mothers inheritance, in the Kingdomes either of England, or other Dominions depending, ſhould ſucceed in them according to the lawes, ſtatutes, and cuſtomes of the ſame.

5 That if it chanced Charles Duke of Auſtrich, the Infant of Spaine to die without Iſſue, then the eldeſt ſonne of this Matrimony ſhould ſucceed in all the Dukedomes, Earledomes, Dominions and Patrimoniall lands, belonging vnto Charles the Emperour, father to the Prince of Spaine, aſwell in Burgoign as in the low Countries, in the Dukedomes of Brabant, Luxenburgh, Gelderland, Zutphane, Freeſeland, in the Countries of Flanders, Artois, Holland, Zeland, Namure, and the land beyond the Iles.

6 That the Dominions of the low Country, and of Burgundy ſhould be excluded from the Patrimoniall deſcent of the ſaid Lord Charles, notwithſtanding his iſſue remained, and ſhould bee enioyed by the eldeſt borne of this marriage without further claime to any other Dominions belonging vnto Spaine: and the reſt of the Children thereof proceeding to haue conuenient portions and Dowry aſsigned them aſwell out of thoſe Countries, as out of England and the others adioined.

7 That if no iſſue male were borne of this marriage then the Eldeſt female ſhould poſſeſſe thoſe Dominions, prouided that ſhe ſhold marry a nobleman, either of the Low Countrey or of the Realm of England, otherwiſe the right of the Succeſsion ſhould remaine in the Lord Charles, yet not ſo cut off, but that that she with the other daughters begot in this marriage should be endowed of their fathers Lands and possessions, aswell in Spaine as in the Low Countries.

8 That for want of Issue by the Lord Charles, and of heire male procreated by this Marriage in that case the Eldest daughter of K. Philip and Q. Marie should succeed both, in the Territories of the Low Countries, as also in the Realmes of England, Spaine, and the rest, after the nature, lawes and customes of the same.

9 That who so succeeded, either he or shee, yet should the severall Dominions be governed by the Natives borne in the Realmes, wholly and intirely after the priuiledges, rites and accustomed manner formerly vsed.

10 That a sincere fraternity, vnitie and peace; should be confirmed for euer betwixt these Nations, so as they should mutually aide each other in all things according to the strength, forme and effect treated of at Westminster, and subscribed vnto at Vtericke.

(72) As these were agreed vpon for the General, so other particulars were articuled with the King himselfe, which were as followeth.

1 That he should not bestow the administration of offices or benefices in the Realme of England, to any stranger or person not borne vnto the English subiection.

2 That his Court should be replenished with Gentlemen and Yeomen the Natiues of the Land.

3 That hee should make no inuasion of state against the Lawes and Customes of the Realme, neither violate the Priuiledges thereto belonging.

4 That hee should not carry the Queene out of her owne Dominions, without her speciall desire, nor none of her Children without consent of her Nobilitie.

5 That if shee should die issuelesse hee should Challenge no right in the Kingdome, but should suffer the succession to come to her next.

6 That he should not carry or suffer to be carried out of the Realme, either Iewels, or other things of especiall estimation, but should faithfully keepe them for the profit of the English Crowne.

7 That hee should not suffer any ships, gunnes, Ordinance and other munition of warre to be conueied out of the Realme, but should see all the Forts and Frontiers of the Land kept, and the same sufficiently stored for their defence.

8 That neither directly nor indirectly, the Realme of England should bee intangled with the warres of his father, and the French King, neither that himselfe should giue any cause for the breach of peace betwixt the two Realmes.

(73) Things thus ordered, with consent of all parties, the marriage with great state was solemnized at Winchester, vpon Wednesday being the 25. of Iuly and Saint Iames day, where the Emperours Embassadors presently pronounced, that in consideration of this marriage, their master had giuen vnto his sonne Philip, the Kingdomes of Naples and Ierusalem, where vpon their Titles by Garter King at Armes, was solemnely proclaimed with these stiles as followeth.

Philip and Marie by the Grace of God, King and Queene of England, France, Naples, Ierusalem, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, Princes of Spaine and Cicil, Archdukes of Austrich, Dukes of Millan, Burgundie and Brabant, Counties of Hapsburge, Flanders and Tyroll,

(74) And according to the stiles, so was the Maiesty of their proceedings, hauing two Swords borne before them as they went from the Church; with other Emperiall Ensignes of their great Magnificence; which nothing was lessened in their passage through London; where English eies beheld Philip, after the affections of their owne hearts, some reioicing as Israel, that Ieroboams golden calues should be againe erected, and some sorrowing as Iudah, that the Brasen Serpent was not broken, all of them assured, that this Salomons sufferance and his wiues zeale, would build againe the Altars that had beene cast downe. 1. King. 11.

(75) The experience whereof Queene Marie her selfe had giuen, euen before shee was crowned, in causing the Latine Seruice againe to bee said, in displacing the reformed Bishops, and in publishing a most straight prohibition against preaching, and printed English Bookes: to all which some time-seruing Church-men gaue their consents, scandalizing not onelie the liues of the ministers, but also the Scriptures translation, and the iust proceedings of King Edwards time; against all which, Master Bourne in a publicke Sermon made at Paules-Crosse (in the presence of the Lord Maior and Bonner his Master) so liberally inueighed, as that one of his Auditors with more distaste then discretion, and more zeale then Religon, threw a Dagger at him to his great danger, and no lesse feare. August. 13. Ann. 1553. A dagger thrown at the Preacher.

(76) And againe the like offence was conceiued against Doctor Pendleton, who in the next yeere after, and in the same place had a gunne desperatly discharged against him: vnto such hatred their Doctrine did driue them, and vnto such sinne the ouer-feruent affectioned lay many times exposed: And no lesse was that Diabolicall deuise of certaine giddie reformers, who had taught a Maide so to speake in a wall, as her hearers beleeued it was the voice of an Angell, being none other, but most seditious speeches, against the Queens proceedings, the Prince of Spaine, the Masse, and Confession. In mockage whereof also a Cat was hanged on a gallowes neere vnto the Crosse in Cheape, her head shorn and wearing a vestore fashioned like vnto a Cope, her fore-feet tyed with around paper betwixt, like vnto the papisticall consecrated bread; and in that maner the eight of April was shewed by the Preacher at Pauls-Crosse both to the offece and content of the Spectators; and to deride the ridiculous Idolatries of the time then in vse, vpon Easter day the same yeere, and in the same Cheape, as the Priest of Saint Pancrasse came to celebrate the resurrection, and after the accustomed manner put his hand into the Sepulchre for the Crucifix (therein purposely bestowed) when he vsed the words of the Euangelist very deuoutly: Surrexit non est hic, He is risen and not heere: found it so indeed, for that his God was gotten away and could neuer after be found. June 10. Ann. 1554. A gun discharged against the Preacher. The Spirit in the walle. A Cat hanged in Cheape. March. 25.

(77) These things (saith Fox) caused both the Queene, and bishops, to conceiue an euill opinion of the Londoners; as too much sauouring of King Edwards reformation, for which cause Bonner commanded all Scriptures printings vpon their Churches walles, to bee blotted out; and many other iniunctions to be inquired after. But from these vain trifles let vs returne to more serious matters in the ensuing Historie. Acts and Mony.

(78) Queene Marie erecting the Masse, and leaning the title of Supremacy to the Pope, sent for her kinsman Cardinall Poole to bee her director in those great businesses, who had beene a long time in forraigne parts, and euer a fauourite vnto the See of Rome, whose life vntill this time, we wil briefly run ouer, so many dependances of story relying vpon him.

(79) Hee was the sonne of Margaret Countesse of Salisbury, the second childe, and onely daughter of George Duke of Clarence, second brother vnto King Edward the fourth: whose youth was spent in litterature at Magdalen Colledge in Oxford; and state increased by King Henrie his kinsman, in bestowing vpon him the Deanry of Exceter. Then trauelled he into Italy, and at Padua studied seuen yeeres, in which The life and story of Cardinall Poole.

which time the King hauing abolished the Pope, hee was sent for into England, but refusing to returne, was proclaimed Traitor, and his Deanery giuen to another: which his losse was presently repaid by his holy Father, in making him Cardinal, & imploying him in many Ambassages, both to the Emperor & French King, with whom he euer dealt against K. Henry, and solicited others by letters to forsake his friendship and obedience, which his doing brought many into danger, and for which lastly his own mother lost her Head.

Poole made Cardinall.

(78) Then was he made Legate of Viterbion, where he determined to haue led a more quiet life: but Pope Paul the third summoning the obtruded Councell of Trent, appointed Poole with two others to be his Vicegerents: Though indeed this Cardinall was none of the forwardest in the matter of iustification, vnto whose opinion therein he drew one Morrell a learned Spaniard, who of purpose was sent to dispute the Popes Doctrine in that Councell.

Poole elected Pope. Goodwin liues of Bishops.

(79) But this Holy father leauing his Chaire empty by death, a faction fell among the Electors, some for the French, and some for the Emperour, which last light vpon Poole, & choose him for Pope. He altogether Imperiall, desired a more orderly election supposing himselfe so gratious in the eyes of most that the same would be continued to his greater praise.

(80) But the French faction working vpon the aduantage, put the rest in minde of the Emperials sacking of Rome, the imprisonment and iests that were made of the Pope, the absence of many Cardinals Electors, whose voices they knew not, yea and Cardinall Caraffa, alleadged particular exception against Poole the elected, charging him (as Pasquill likewise did) with incontinency of body, as also of Heresie, for arguing vpon a iustifying faith in the Councell of Trent, for frequenting the company with Anthonie Flaminius a knowne Protestant, and since he was Legate, that he neuer had punished that doctrine with death.

Poole accused by Cardinall Caraffa.

(81) But these accusations, were rather to shrub off his faire top, that Caraffa himselfe might more eminently be seene, who thought if Poole failed, to be their faireſt marke; wherein his politicke expectation was farre ouerseene. For the English Cardinall so cleered himselfe, that the French Caraffa receiued disgrace, and all their voices went for Poole euen the same night, which he againe seemed to dislike of, saying, that his election should not be a worke of darkenes, and therefore willed them orderly to proceed vpon the next day; such assurance had his hopes conceiued, that hee thought destinie had beene inforced to set the Papall Crowne vpon his Head.

Poole againe chosen Pope.

(82) But whether it were his double delay, or his neglecting to strike when the yron was hot, the Electors change their determination, and choose the Cardinall of de Monte for Pope, who named himselfe Iulius the third, and he to congratulate Poole for his Backwardnes, enforced Caraffa to aske him forgiuenes before they departed the Conclaue: Poole thus disappointed of the Papall Chaire, retired himselfe vnto Verona, where in a Monastery of S. Bennets (which order he had assumed and was the Patron) he made his Residence, as desirous to leade a more contemplatiue life.

(83) But scarcely was he setled before he heard of King Edwards death, and a message sent from Queene Marie (who had beene brought vp vnder the Counteſse his Mother) for his returne into England. Her affection towards him, he knew was very great both for his person, his learning and religion, and himselfe relied much vpon the old familiarity betwixt them, as also of his birth being of the blood roiall; for which causes he sore longed homeward, not doubting but if things stood as he thought, to get a dispensation, to lay off the Hat, and to put on a Crowne.

Cardinall Poole sent for by Queene Mary.

(84) But the Emperour mistrusting what this Prelate intended, found deuices to hold him beyond Seas, vntill the match was concluded betweene Queene Mary and his Sonne. And hitherto Cardinall Poole applauded by the Pope, beganne now to enter into his frowne, for being in England, and Archbishop of Canterbury: his old accuser, the foresaid Caraffa, had in the meane while obtained the Papacy vnder the name of Paul the fourth: when as presently he sent Frier Peto, whom he consecrated Bishop of Sarum, and discharged Poole of his legatiue power, which doings the Queene tooke so ill, that shee forbad Peto to enter the land, vntill a reconciliation was made betwixt the Pope and Cardinall Poole her kinsman. Which man as hath beene saide, for soliciting Potent Princes against King Henry, in the quarrell of Rome, had runne in great displeasure with the English, whereby some Acts of Parliament were made against him: all which were now repealed, and Lord Reinold Poole receiued as an Angell of God, vnto whom that honorable house presented a Petition, to bee receiued againe into the bosome of Rome.

A.D. 1553.

(85) The suit easily granted, and absolution giuen, all things proceeded at the deuotion of the Romanists. Images were commanded to be erected againe in the Churches: Holy-water, Pax, and Censures, imploied at the Celebration of their Masses and Mattens: Oyle, Creame, and Spittle, vsed in the Administration of the Sacrament of Baptisme. Altars furnished with Pictures, Costly Couerings, & the Crucifix thereon solemnly placed: vnto whom Lights, Candles, and Tapers, with great adoration were offered, and all to Captiuate the senses of the zealous Beholder, in which zeale Queene Marie her selfe gaue a full testimoniall, in restoring againe all Ecclesiasticall liuings assumed to the Crowne, saying, that shee set more by the saluation of her owne soule, then shee did by tenne Kingdomes. A worthy speech verily, and good example of a Prince, but slowly followed of many meane subiects, who in this case doe rather mussell the mouth of the Oxe, that treadeth out their Corne, then suffer such as serue at the Altar, to liue by the Altar.

The rites of Rome restored in England.

(86) And surely so well inclined was Mary of her selfe, that had not the zeale of her religion, and the authority of Churchmen ouer-swaied her owne disposition, the flames of their consuming fires had not mounted so high. But woe to the procurer of those sixe Articles, (for which many had died) enacted by King Henry the eight, whose rigour in some sort himselfe had both qualified and repealed, which were againe put in practize, especially two, the one of them touching life, and the other losse of goods; which last was the separation of man and wife, the greatest offence to mutuall society, and naturall affection, as can be committed; & that of life so tyrannically followed, as the Law it selfe may seeme with Draco's to be writ in blood, for within the compasse of lesse then foure yeeres continuance, there died no lesse, for the testimoniall of their conscience in this case, then two hundred seauenty and seauen persons without regard of degree, sexe or age.

Queene Mary commendable in her owne disposition.

(87) In the heate of whose flames were consumed fiue Bishops, one and twenty Diuines, eight Gentlemen, eighty foure Artificers, one hundred husbandmen seruants and labourers, twenty sixe wiues, twenty widowes, nine Virgins, two boyes, and two Infants, one of them whipped to death by B. Bonner, & the other springing out of his mothers wombe from the stake as shee burned, was by the Sergeants throwne againe into the fire: Which barbarous cruelty, howsoeuer the Author of Englands three Conuersions, would excuse, as worthy of death; depraying the sufferers, of learning, religion, ciuill manners, and honesty of life; yet the more charitable of his owne ranke, and profession, doe pittie the spilling of so much Christian blood: the greatest point of no greater sinne, then to beleeue Christs

(86) The rigour therefore that fell from his mouth, who wished many more had so suffered, when the sword was so drawne, is farre from the precept and sufferance of Christ, that would haue euen tares grow vnpluckt, till his harueſt were in, and yet if those be his sheepe that follow his voyce, and his word sufficient to make the man of God perfect as himselfe, and Apostle hath taught, then were these excusable by their Aduersaries testimonies, whose Prolocutor in a Conuocation assembled, publikely confessed that these deiected Ministers had the word, but the Prelates in place the possession of the sword; which how they then made it drunke with the blood of Gods Saincts, let him that hath the two edged sword in his mouth, at the great day of triall declare, to whose iudgement and mercie I leaue them.

(87) Sixty foure more were persecuted for their profession and faith, whereof seauen were whipped, sixteene perished in prison, and were buried in dunghils, many lay in captiuitie condemned, but were released, and saued by the happy entrance of peaceable Elizabeth; and many fled the Land in those daies of distresse, amongst whom most memorable is that of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke, with her husband Richard Bartie Esquire, whose Story and troubles happened as followeth.

The story of Katherine Dutchesse of Suffolke.

(88) This Lady Katherine was the only daughter, and sole heire of Lord William Baron of Willoughby, and of Eresby; and the last wife of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke lately deceased, in whose time how shee affected the Papall Profession, in massing, and maskings, was made knowne by cloathing a dogge in a Rochet, and calling him Gardiner, and againe, in the daies of King Edward, Gardiner saluting her from his prison windowe in the Tower, shee told him it was well with the Lambes now the wolfe was shut vp. These stucke sore vpon the Bishops stomacke, who being now risen to bee Lord Chancellour of England, and she in disgrace with the Queene for her match in marrying Master Barty a man too inferiour for her high estate, he thought it a fit time and occasion to requite, and to that end sent for Master Bartie her husband, charging him to be indebted foure thousand pound to the Queene, which was owing her by his Ladies late husband the Duke of Suffolke, vnto whom shee was Executrix, but this was onely the trayne of a false fire, and the Dutchesse religion, the marke he aymed at, for whom Master Bartie so wisely wrought, as himselfe was appointed to be her perswader, and so inwardly grew with the Lord Chancellor, that by his meanes he obtained licence to trauell beyond Seas, for a debt owing to his Dutchesse by the Emperour.

The Dutchesse no fauourer of the Popish religion.

The Dutchesse of Suffolke fleeth the Land.

(89) Bartie being gone, and Lady Katherine secretly to follow, vpon the first of Ianuarie with foure men, two women, and her young daughter, her selfe apparrelled like a Merchants wife, from Lyon Key in London departed, the morning very misty, and her heart fraught with feare; for no sooner was shee gone, than newes thereof came to the Court, and search made after her, as farre as to Leigh, before her Barke could attaine to the place: where being shrowded by a Marchant vnder the name of his daughter, shee escaped to Sea; but twice her shippe with contrary windes was driuen to the same shoare, to her great danger and no little griefe: yet lastly, shee arriued in Brabant where shee met with her husband: whence (being clad like a froe) they came into Cleueland, and at Santon seated themselues, til further prouision could be made.

(90) But the Townsmen suspecting they were not the Persons they went for, and the Bishoppe of Arras hearing that they were Protestants, purposed with the Magistrate to impeach their liberties, which Bartie hearing of, with his Froe and daughter, attended onely with two seruants suddenly made away vnto Wesell, a Towne priuiledged with the Stilliard in London. In trauell they were ouertaken by night, the weather was rainie, and the thaw vpon a great frost, made the way more deepe, in which distresse his two seruants he sent to seeke some reliefe, whilest himselfe (the surer on foot) bare the childe; and the Dutchesse to ease him carried his Rapier and Cloke.

(91) Thus passing thorow mire, dirt, and darke night, about seuen of the Clocke, all wet and wearie, they got vnto Wesell, where, he being suspected to be a Launce-knight, and shee his woman no better then naught, could get no entertainement, the language they had not, the childe cried pittifullie, the mother wept bitterly, the cold was extreme, and the raine powred downe as the clowdes had beene broken. In this distresse the Church-porch was thought vpon to shrowde them from raine, and to that ende Master Barty sent his two seruants to buye Coales and straw: but repairing towards this his cold Inne, he met with two boyes that vnderstood Latine, of whom hee demanded for the Ministers house, who presently brought him to the place, where he supped. His name was Pernesell and had beene in England, where, of the Dutches he had receiued kind courtesie, and now at Wesell imploied his Ministery among certaine Wallons, who hearing that the Dutches was fled out of England, and that at Santon shee liued nothing safe, had procured for their abode in Wesell, without making knowne who these English were saue onely vnto the chiefe Magistrate.

The great distresse of the Dutchesse.

(92) Master Barty desiring to speake with the Minister, he presently came downe, who seeing the Dutches so disguised in apparel, and bemired in durt, could not speake vnto her for teares, and bringing them in with glad hearts no doubt, Master Barty changed apparell with the good man, the Dutchesse with his wife, and their childe, with the childe of the house: and thus were they comforted by this good Preachers meanes.

(93) Heere they seated not long, but that a suddaine watchword was sent them from Sir Iohn Mason, Queene Maries Ambassador in Netherland, that the Lord Paget had fained an arrant to the Spaw, and that the Duke of Brunswicke with tenne Ancients, would passe by Wesell for the seruice of Austricke, against the French King, by whom the Dutchesse and her husband should be intercepted and deliuered vnto the Lord Paget.

The Dutchesse sought after to be impeached.

(94) From hence therfore in haste they remoued to the Town Wincheim in high Germany, which was seated in the Palsgraues Dominions, where by his Protection they continued till their maintenance beganne to scant, and they also almost fainting vnder so heauy a burthen, began to faile of all hope. At which very instant (God so mouing the hearts of his Princes) the Palatine of Vilua, and the King of Pole hearing of their distresse, sent them a safe conduct, vnder the Palatines seale with assurance of maintenance, if they would come vnto those parts.

God doth helpe when man doth faile.

(95) From Wincheim therefore they forthwith departed, and in Wagon tooke towards Franckford, but by the Langraues Captaine were intercepted and set vpon in the high way, so that Master Barty was forced to stand at defence, wherein the Captains Horse was slaine vnder him, and the cry maintained that he was slaine himselfe, whereupon Barty by the counsell of the Dutchesse, and swiftnesse of his horse fled amaine, but was so eagerly followed vpon opinion of murther, that hee hardly escaped with life, yet lastly they got into Poland, where they were honorably entertained vntill the death of Queen Mary, whose life in the meane while let vs returne to relate.

(96) The November next following her mariage, the Queene was reported to haue beene conceiued with child, for ioy whereof Te Deum was cõmanded solemnly to be sung, and Processions, and Praiers, made for her safe deliuerance. The Queene spoke her Chamber, the Court was full of Midwiues, and Gentlewomen attendants, Rockers were prouided, the Cradle prepared, and all made so certain, that some were punished for making doubt of the contrary. Insomuch that it passed in Parliament, that if God should take away Queene Marie, this their young Master comming into the world, should find himselfe prouided for; where it was by Act ordained, that King Philip should be Protector of her Issue, and Gouernour of the Realmes, vntill their Prince or Princesse should come to able yeeres.

So called by Sir Rich. Southwell a Knight of the house An. 1 & 2. Philip. & Mariæ.

(97) Howbeit as it should seeme this Spanish King had little confidence in the English, for, at his first entrance, hee had the hall dore of his Court continually kept shut, neither any suffered to enter, vnlesse his busines was first made known: the Lords hauing leaue to depart London, had strait commandement to send all their harnesse and Artillerie to the Tower; which was done, in regard of the maligners of this marriage: yea and somewhat doubtfull hee was also of those, who in shew bare him a faire face; the rather for that *a Noble man in consultation, had giuen his counsell to cut off Lady Elizabethes head, assuring himselfe, that those so bad minded to their naturall Princesse, could not bee better vnto him a stranger: who contrariwise vpon this ground so laid the foundation of his true honour, as it gained him loue of all true English hearts: for from that day he neuer left to solicite his Queen for the deliuery of that innocent Princesse her sister, who still remained a solitary Prisoner in Woodstocke, though no proofes could bee brought for any offence.

*Lord Paget.

K. Philip a great friend vnto Lady Elizabeth.

(98) At last his suit was obtained, and Lady Elizabeth brought vnto Hampton Court, hauing not seene the Queene for two yeeres before, here shee was lockt vp, and laid at by Gardiner to submit her selfe, till some foureteene dayes after, shee was sent for into the Queenes Chamber about tenne of the Clocke in the night: which she no sooner had entred, but falling vpon her knees, shee praied God to preserue her Soueraigne Maiesty; protesting her loyalty and truth to her person, whatsoeuer had beene spoken or instigated to the contrary. Vnto whom the Queene somewhat sharpely said, then you will not confesse your offence, I see; but rather stand stoutely vpon your truth; I pray God your truth may so fall out; If not (quoth the Princesse) I request neither fauour nor pardon at your Maiesties hand: well, then said the Queen, you stand so stifly vpon your own loyaltie, belike you suppose to haue been wrongfully punished: I must not say so to your Maiesty said Lady Elizabeth: but you will then so report to others it seemeth, said Queene Mary: no, and it please your Maiesty saide the Lady, I haue borne, and must beare the burthen my selfe, I most humbly beseech your Graces good opinion of me, and to thinke mee your true Subiect, which from the beginning hetherto I haue euer beene, and wil be for euer so long as my life lasteth. The Queene replying in Spanish, said, God knoweth, and so they departed; K. Philip as is thought standing behind the Arras heard what was said.

Lady Elizabeth brought in presence of the Queene.

The conference of the Queene and Lady Elizabeth.

(99) Some seuen dayes after, her Grace was discharged of Benefeild her Taylor, and had leaue of liberty, yet so, that Sir Thomas Pope a Priuie Counsellor, and M. Gage the Queenes Gentleman Vsher, were still her Attendants all Queene Maries time: her Gentlewoman Mistresse Asbley was sent to the Fleete, and three other waiting maides vnto the Tower; but the death of Gardiner immediately following, these stormes grew more calmer, and Lady Elizabeth euery day more affectionatelie respected.

Lady Elizabeth discharged of imprisonment.

(100) About this time, William Constable, alias Fetherston, a Millers sonne in the North, bruted himselfe to bee King Edward the sixt, but was seconded by none of any esteeme, and therefore the lesse dangerous or likely to bee beleeued. Notwithstanding all diligent search was laid for the Counterfeit; and hee lastly taken at Eltham in Kent, from whence to Hampton Court hee was presently conuaied, where his answeres were so simple, that hee was esteemed as a frantiche, and sent to the Marshall-See for a Lunaticke foole: and from thence in a Cart this counterfeite king (whose Crowne was a paper inscribed with his fault) was brought vnto Westminster, and from thence whippped vnto Smithfield, whence hee was banished into the North, and without further punishment was so released: But this Fetherston the next yeere (as a dogge returning to his vomit) gaue it forth that K. Edward was aliue, whereupon he was again apprehended, condemned of Treason, and hanged at Tyborne.

Mar. 10.

(101) Now the expected time of Queene Maries deliuerance being fully approached, a rumor ranne in London and elsewhere; that a Prince was borne; for ioy whereof the Bels were rung, the Bonefires flamed, Processions made, and some in their Sermons described the beauty of that goodly boy, and great Prince. At Antwerpe also the like triumphes were made by the English Marchantes, the Mariners shooting off their Ordinance; for which an hundred Pistolets were sent them from the Lady Regent: but these flying reports proued but wind, which turned the Vane shortly into another point; for the truth bursting forth, told for a certaine, that the Queene had neuer beene conceiued, neither indeed was euer like to bee: which raised as many doubts, as had beene tales of her deliuerance: some affirming that shee was with Child, but miscarried, some, that shee was deceiued by a Tympany: and some that this rumor was spread for a policy: but what the truth was saith Grafton, I referre vnto others that know more.

(102) King Philip thus frustrate of his hope for his Heire, vpon the fourth of September went ouer the Seas to visite his Father the Emperour, and to take possession of the Low-Countries, where hee stayed one yeere and six moneths, to the great griefe of Queene Mary his wife, whom as some thought he little affected, and this his long stay made the suspition no lesse. But now returning to Douer, hee was by his Queene met on the way, and brought through London, accompanied with many Peeres of the Realme, as in triumph against a Coronation.

King Philip absent from the Queene a yeer and six monthe. A.D. 1557. March 18.

(103) In whose absence many Conspiracies had beene intended, but their foggy smoakes were vtterly extinguished before the fire could burst into flame: for certaine persons plotting to robbe the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, meant with the money to raise warre in the Land; the Leaders into this attempt were Henry Peckham, Iohn Daniel, Richard Vdall, Iohn Throckmorton, Iohn Dethicke, William Stanton, William Rossey, Iohn Beadell and White, the reuealer of the same intendments. These all excepting White, were at sundy times executed, and Sir Anthony Kingston apprehended for the same, died on the way vnto London.

(104) The like stirres were attempted by one Cleber a Schoolemaster, sometime at Dys in Norfolke, who in the Parrish Church of Yarle, among a great assembly at the celebration of a marriage, stood vp and read a penned, but traiterous proclamation against the Queene, perswading the people to take Armes, and to free the land of wrongs done by strangers.

Conspiracies in Norfolke.

(105) So likewise Thomas Stafford, second sonne to the Lord Stafford, with other Conspirators against the King and Queene, fearing the iust punishments for their deserts, had fled the land into parts beyond the Seas; from whence attempting still to broach their Rebellions, they sent certaine bookes and letters written and printed, full of most slanderous vntruthes: and now following King Philip into England, assisted by some English and strangers, tooke by stealth the Castell of Skarborough in Yorkeshire, where hee published a most shamefull proclamati-mation against the Queene, traiterously affirming that shee was neither rightfull, nor worthy of raign, and that the King had giuen vnto his Spaniards the greatest and strongest holds of the land. But by the prowesse of Thomas Pearsey (presently created Earle of Northumberland) hee was surprised, sent to London, and there made shorter by the head. All these stirres quieted, new troubles were rather sought for then ministred, and more losse followed to Englands dishonour, then glory had beene gained by this Spanish great Match.

Thomas Stafford beheaded.

(106) For the Emperour ouer-worne with the affaires of the world, and wearied with the troubles of turmoiling wars, or rather touched with remorse of conscience for the infinite miseries brought by him vpon Florence, Naples, Sicilie, Tuscane, Elbo, and Calabria, being perswaded that these mournfull iarres of Christian Princes had giuen to the Turke aduantage vpon diuers parts of Europe, hee called his sonne King Philip of England vnto Bruxels (as is said) where, by authenticke letters bearing date the fiue and twentieth of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him, commanding all his estates and subiects to acknowledge and hold him their lawfull King; and among many other instructions and most wise exhortations, gaue him charge chiefly to hold amity with the French, lest otherwise the warres of those Puissant Nations might oppresse al Christendome.

Charles the Emperour resigneth all his Dominions to his sonne K. Philip.

(107) King Philip indeed was much inclined to peace, and Queene Mary his wife at that time much more, both to hold him with her at home, & to support the Religion which shee had raised, by restoring the Clergie their wonted possessions, whereof much was then held in the Noblemens hands, from whose hard-hold, hardly could any thing bee wrested; but those in her owne, shee freely resigned by Parliament, with this most Christian resolution, and princely saying: that shee set more by the saluation of her owne Soule, then shee did by the reuenewes of ten Kingdomes, and so committed the restauration and dispose thereof vnto the Pope and Cardinall Poole his Legate, to the great wealth of the Church, and empouerishing of the Crowne.

(108) King Philip following his fathers aduise, made peace with France to continue for fiue yeeres, which no sooner was made, then was again broken, but most of all to the losse of the English: for the Kings did not loue, though their weapons were laid downe, and ancient hatred bred daily new discontents: one principall was ministred by Pope Paul the fourth, then an enemy vnto the Spaniard, whom Duke Alua had mued vp within the walles of Rome. His hope of helpe was in Henry the French King, vnto whome hee sent a triumphant hatte, with a stately Sword, and thereupon had succour by the Guyse, who by force made his way open into Rome: But the French decreasing for want of pay, and the Spaniard still raising their Trophees of victory, the Pope thought it sureft to hold with the strongest, & so made frustrate his amity with the French.

John Sleidon.

(109) Queene Mary of England, now the Pope was for Spaine, and Philip her husband preparing for France, to shew her great loue and obedience to both, rather sought an occasion against King Henry, then any ministred by him for the breach of peace. Her pretences were many, as that the French King had instigated one Dudley and Ashton, vnto a new conspiracy, which they consulted vpon in his Ambassadors house in London, and being reuealed, fled into France, where they were maintained by an annuall pension. The like she alleadged against King Henry for succouring of Stafford, and his rebellious complices, for suffering his Pyrats to molest her Seas, & for want of more, renewed the remembrances of Northumberland and wyats rebellions, who as was alleadged, were supported by him.

(110) These things premised, a defiance was sent into France, and was pronounced vnto Henry at Rhemes by Clarenceaux King at Armes. The French King loth to heare of these warres made his answere and preparations accordingly: and Queene Mary contrary to promise, entangling her subiectes with the quarrels of the Spaniards, with sound of Trumpet in London proclaimed warres against France. To prosecute which, King Philip her husband passed ouer to Calis, and thence into Flanders, where hee made prouision to enter the field: after whom the Queene sent a thousand horsemen, foure thousand footmen, and two thousand Pioners, and the Earle of Pembroke was appointed Captaine Generall, vnder whom in seuerall places serued Vicount Montacute*, the L. Grey of Wilton, the Earle of * Rutland, the Earle of* Lincolne, the Earle of Bedford, the Earle of* Leicester, and the Earle of Warwicke, the Lords Howard, De la Ware, Windsor, Bray, Shandoys, and Dudley, with many other Knights of approued valiancy.

(111) These passing the Seas, ioined with King Philip, whilest the Dukes of Sauoy and Brunswicke, the Earles of Egmond, Horne, and Mansfeild, had inuaded the French confines, and planted a strong siege before Saint Quintins; to whose rescue Monsieur Mountmorancy Constable of France came with nine hundred men at Armes, as many light horsemen, seauen hundred Reisters, twenty two Ensignes of Lancequenets, and sixteen Ensigns of the French: and thus furnished, he meant to put more Souldiers into the Towne, but in the assay so miscarried, that himselfe was both hurt & taken prisoner with eight Noblemen more, all of them Knightes of the Order, and not many dayes after, King Philip with his English came to the siege, by whose manly prowesse Saint Quintins was taken, for ioy whereof great triumphes were made in England, which long lasted not, through the losse of Callis.

S. Quintins taken by the English. August, 20.

(112) For this great victory made the English both negligent and careless, so that the Towne of Callis, and the Forts thereabout for defence, were vnrespectiuelie regarded, and besides the neglect of supply to those peeces, the Souldiers thinking al out of danger, stood gazing at the shadow till the substance was lost: for the French being netled, that S. Quintins was Philips, let slippe no occasion wherin was aduantage: and the Duke of Guize imploying the Constables place, determined to put in proofe an enterprize for Callis, which long and many times had beene purposed vpon.

The English negligent after Saint Quintins was woone.

(113) This danger fore-seene, intelligence thereof was sent into England, but no supply heard of, first the Master of the Ordinance posted to the Councell, and secondly followed the Captaine of the Castell himselfe, but either by wilfull negligence or lacke of credite with the Queene and Councell, those businesses in France were slenderly regarded, vntill the supply was altogether too late. For the Duke of Guize with a maruellous celerity approached the English Frontier, vnder a colour to victuall Boloigne and Ard, and vpon a little sorry platte of ground, intrenched at Sandgate, and thence diuiding his Army into two partes, sent the one vnto Ricebancke, whilest the other laid battery to two Forts at once, both which hee wanne within the space of twelue howres, the Captaine and Souldiers secretly departing to Callis. The like successe had the French against Ricebanke, being abandoned by the English Souldiers, and left to the Guize and his dispose.

(114) Then were Canons mounted against Callis it selfe, and with continuall battery for three dayes together, a breach made in the wall, not farre from the Water-gate, but yet vnassaultable, the English within so maintained the defence: this then a traine of false fire (for the French neuer meant their accesse that way) whilest all attended to make good the breach, the Duke had planted fifteene double Canons against the Castell, which once perceiued, the Callizians knowing their resistance to weake, stored red Barrels of Gun powder within the Keepe, meaning to blow vp the French if they there entred, but that deuise failed; hauing waded through the ditch their clothes dropping wet, disabled the traine of powder to take fire, so that the French gotte the Castle with the death of Sir Anthony Ager Marshall of the Towne, his sonne and heire and fourescore English besides.

Callis surrendered to the French.

(117) The Lord Wentworth then Deputie of the Towne seeing all in like danger if meanes were delayed, sent vnto the Castle to haue a Parlee for composition, which the French foorthwith accepted, and sent out two Gentlemen for pledges whilest Iohn Herfield Master of the Ordinance, and Edward Hall Constable of the Castle, concluded vpon these dishonourable Articles, as followeth:

Vnhonourable Articles.

1 That the Towne, the great Artillery, Victuals and munition should bee yeelded freely to the French.

2 That the liues of all the inhabitants should bee saued, and haue their safe conduct to depart.

3 That the Lord Deputy with fifty others whom the Duke would appoint, should remaine prisoners and be put to their ransome.

The hard vsage of the English.

(116) Things thus ordered, the English were commanded into the Churches of our Lady, and Saint Nicholas, where they remained that whole day, the night following, and vntill the next day in the afternoone, without either meate or drinke, in which time the Duke of Guize commanded by Proclamation that all Iewels, Plate and Money to the value of a groate should bee laid vpon the Altar, and that vpon paine of death, a sorrowfull offertory towards the English, and a great enrichment vnto the French. Then was the Towne voided of fiue hundred ordinary Souldiers (a small Garrison indeed to man such a place) of Townsmen, women and children, foure thousand two hundred; the Lord Wentworth Deputy, Sir Ralphe Chamberlaine Captaine of Ricebancke, Nicholas Alexander Captaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grimston, Iohn Rogers, and others, to the number of fifty were sent prisoners into France vntill ransome were paid: And thus the Town & Forts that were won by the victorious K. Edward the third, & that by no lesse then eleuen moneths seige, hauing now beene possessed by the English the space of two hundred and eleuen yeeres, was in the compas of eight daies besieged, surprized and wonne in the depth of Winter to the worlds wonder, and great suspition of treachery, which happened the seuenteenth day of Ianuary, and in the same moneth were surrendred the strong forts of Guizes, and Hames, whereby all the English footing was lost in the Continent of France.

Edward the eleuenth from William the Conquerour, wanne it: and Mary the eleuenth from Edward, lost it.

(117) This winning of Callis & the other strong holds as they were ioyous to the French, and with Te Deum & Bonefires celebrated with no lesse solemnity, then was that for the recouery of the County Oye, & the fort won from the English in An. 1347. so was it greeuous vnto the English Nobility, and most of al vnto Queene Marie her selfe. Insomuch as shee ceased not to trauell with the King and Councel how to couer the dishonour of her Raigne, by this losse of Callis; and albeit some assaies were made against Breest, and Mounsieur Thermes the new Captaine of Callis taken prisoner by County Egmont General for King Philip in the Low Countries, yet the maine was neglected, and could not be recouered for any composition, which stroke so deepe a melancholy into Queene Maries minde, as shee letted not to say, that the losse of Callis was written in her heart, and might therein bee read when her body should bee opened. In which passions she continued the rest of her Raigne, which neuer had beene very prosperous, nor greatly pleasurable vnto her selfe, after shee had abolished the Gospell, restored the Popes Supremacy, and maried a stranger, who was vnto her a stranger indeede.

Queene Maries sayings for the losse of Callis.

(118) Of al since the Conquest her Raigne was the shortest, only excepting that of Richard the Tyrant, but much more bloudy then was his, and more blood spilt in that short time of her Raigne, then had beene shed for case of Christianity, in any Kings time since Lucius the first establisher of the Gospell in this Realme. Her conceptions failing, extreame dearths raging, hurt done by thunders from heauen, and by fire in the royall Nauie, forraigne losses, Callis surrendered, and King Philips keeping from Court, daily augmented Queene Maries melancholy, which lastlie increasing to a burning feauer made an end of her life, at her Mannor of S. Iames neere Westminster, the 7. of Nouem. and yeere of Christs incarnation 1558. whē she had raigned fiue yeers foure moneths, & eleuen daies, and liued forty two yeeres nine moneths and sixe daies, whose body lyeth interred in a Chappell in the Minster of Saint Peters at Westminster, without any monument or other remembrance.

CHAPTER XXIIII.

D.1558

THE Cloud thus set, that threatned more stormes, and a quiet calme happening when the rage was at highest, that wished Sunne then ascended our Horizon, whose rayes (as had beene hoped) presently dispelled all foggy Mists from Englands faire Skie; which was, the most milde Princesse Lady Elizabeth, another Debora, and nursing mother of Gods Saints, who being then at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, was there first saluted Queene, and the same day, with great ioy and full consent of both the Houses of Parliament (at that time assembled) was solemnly proclaimed Queene of England, with all other stiles rightly belonging to that Imperiall Title:

(2) Shee entred her Government vpon Thursday the seauenteenth of November, the same day that her sister Queene Mary died, the yeer of Christs assuming our flesh, 1558. and of her own age, twenty foure yeeres, two moneths and ten dayes. In which time Proclamations came forth, forbidding any man to preach but by appointment, or to alter any Ceremonies, but according to the rites in her owne Chappell, as also that the Letanie, the Epistles and Gospels should bee read in all Churches in the English tongue.

The first proclamation touching Religion.

(3) All things in a readines vpon the fourteenth of Ianuary, with great triumphes and sumptuous shewes, shee passed through London towards Westminster to receiue the Imperiall Crown; but before shee entred her Chariot in the Tower, acknowledging that the seat was Gods into which shee was to enter, and she his Vicegerent to weild the English Scepter; in that royall assembly with eyes and hands eleuated to heauen vpon her knees, shee praied for his assistance, as Salomon did for wisdome when hee tooke the like charge; with a thankefull remembrance vnto God for his continued preseruation, who had brought her through great dangers vnto that present dignity. In which triumphall State as shee passed through the streetes of London, when the Booke of God was presented vnto her at the little Conduit in Cheape, shee receiued the same with both her hands, and kissing it, laid it to her breast saying, that the same had euer beene her chiefest delight, and should bee the rule by which she meant to frame her gouernment. And to testifie her benigne acceptance of the Lord Maior, and Citizens approued loues, she assured them that shee lacked no will, nor (as shee hoped) power to bee to them as gratious a Prince as euer raigned in the Land, and that for the publike good, if occasion were ministred shee would spend her deerest bloud.

(4) The fifteenth of Ianuary (being Sunday) the Coronation was solemnely performed, and the Imperiall Crowne set on her head by Doctor Owen Oglethorpe Bishoppe of Carlile, the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury being vacant euer since her entrance, by the death of Cardinall Poole, who died the same day that Queene Mary did.

Her Coronation

Cardinall Poole and Q. Mary died both in one day.

(5) Presently there followed a Parliament, wherin the Title of Supremacy was againe restored to the Crowne, with the first fruits, and Tenths of all Ecclesiasticall liuings, and the Booke of Common Prayer ratified for an vniforme celebration of Gods diuine seruice in the English Churches; as also those Acts repealed, that were enacted by Queen Marie, in fauor of the Romish Religion. Things thus established, and liberty giuen to the Gospell, many that had fled the Realm in case of conscience, returned, and were prouided for according to their worthes, and that Gods Truth might be established, (which thing her princely heart chiefly sought after) a conference was commanded and begunne at westminster the last of March, concerning certain Articles to be discussed amongst the Diuines. The Propositions were three.

These being solemnly set with many Honourable Counsellors among them, before the Conference could well beginne, it was finally ended, and all through the default of the Bishops (as Stow hath alleadged) who, first pleaded a mistaking of their directions, and in the next sitting, vtterly refused either to write their owne, or to reade the others reasons, whereby all was vndone that was intended, and whereof a part was * imprinted as is yet to bee seene.

The Conference ended almost as soone as begun.

(6) During the time of this Parliament a Petition was made vnto her Maiesty for the hope of roiall Issue, to moue her vnto marriage; vnto which eloquent Oration deliuered by the Speaker, shee re- "plyed with great thankes for their louing care for "her, and their owne Country: but as touching "their requeſt, shee answered, that from the time, "when first shee considered her selfe to bee borne a "seruitor of God, shee happily did choose, and in "truth best liked a Virgins life, from which, neither "Ambition of high marriages, which had been for- "merly offered her by her Prince, nor the grieuan- "ces sustained by her, whiles shee liued among "those enemies, whose indignation was death, had "hitherto beene able to diuert her: but whether "her yeeres and answere could concord together "in their iudicious minds; she certainely knew not; "yet this shee assured them, that as then shee stood "so affected, and if that affection changed, her choise "should bee onely of such a one, as should bee as "carefull, shee would not say, as her selfe, (because "shee knew her selfe best) but as any of them for the "Realmes good, and yet withall shee considered, "that although her selfe, for their welfare (if neede "were) would not shunne death, yet might her "Issue, (as often hapneth to the best parents) grow "out of kind, and proue vngracious. And there- "fore to leaue behind her a more lasting and grate- "full remembrance, shee held it sufficient, that a "Marble-stone should declare to posterities, that she "a Queene had raigned, liued, and dyed a Virgin: and so with many thankes dismissed the assembly. How the first was accomplished, wee that liued vnder her raigne haue seene; but how insufficient that one stone is to containe, & continuate the remembrance of her vertuous, pious, and glorious gouernment, the whole world doth at this day, and shall to all succeeding ages witnesse, whilest the Earth rests in the Center, and the Heauens haue restlesse mouings.

The first was that the quarrell of war was not Englands, but Philips of Spaine; in whose fauour Queene Mary his wife against the will of her Councell, sent him aid of her Subiects. And if in case the French

She claimeth restitution of Callis from the French.

Ex MS. The instructions of Q. Elizabeth sent to the Commissioners.

Proofes that Callis was Englands.

French should challenge Callis as inhereditaty vnto the Crowne of France, to that they should answere, that there were many Signiories and places in France, wherunto the English might make their iust claime, and some in possession since Callis was English, which Towne was not onely Lawfully granted, and assured from the French themselues vnto the Crowne of England, but was also allowed by Articles of all treatises of peace, for the space of two hundred yeeres and more, this euermore specially prouided, that Callis should remaine in the quiet possession of the English.

Great summes of Mony owed by France.

And the better to impresse the deliuery of Callis, in the mould of the French, they were to demand certaine arrerages, wherein their King and Realme had fallen for great summes of monies and debts accruing to the English Crowne: aswell by the acknowledgement of the mother of King Francis then being Regent of France, and iudgement thereupon giuen; as also by the treaty of More, de Dato, 1525. The treaty of perpetuall peace, de Dato, 1527. and the late treaty betweene King Henry the eight, and King Francis, for the deliuery of Bullein, de dato, 1546. by all which appeareth, that there was two Millions of Crownes due, and very little thereof yet paid, the copies of which treatises and confession, the said Commissioners haue with them. Also another debt of an hundred thousand crownes, as appeareth by a Bill of King Francis hand. And where also there is one perpetuall pension of fiftie thousand crownes due, as appeareth by the treatie of perpetuall peace, and one other pension of Salt, as appeareth by the same treatie. All which notwithstanding, rather then the French should retaine Callis, her maiesty was contented to remit the whole debt and arrerages: but without that in no wise shee held it conuenient to conclude peace with France, and that obtained, shee remitted the other Articles to the discretion of the Commissioners. But the English Queene was no more desirous to haue Callis, then the French King vnwilling to let it goe. Whereupon lastly it was thus concluded, That Callis should remaine French, the tearme of eight yeeres, and those expired, should returne to the English vpon forfeiture of fiue hundred thousand crownes; the branch of which agreement, from the Latine, and that from the originall, is thus translated.

(9) It is couenanted, agreed, and concluded, that the said most noble Lady Queene of England, shall suffer and permit the foresaid most Christian King of France, his heires and successors, to hold, possesse, and peaceably enioy, from the day of the date of this present treaty, vntill the terme of eight yeeres following, the Towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices belonging to the same, and also the port or hauen of the said Towne, with the Tower of Ruysbank, and also the Towers, Lordships, villages, and places of Newnainbridge, Merke, Oye, Hams, Sandgate, the Tower and Towne of Guisnes, and all the rest of that County taken in this last warre, and all other Townes, Castles, Villages, Lands, Dominions, Territories, Waters, Riuers, Hauens, Defences, Forts and Shores, and generally all places whatsoeuer scituate vnto them by the sea, which the said most Christian King hath gotten in this last warre, and taken by force of Armes, in the raigne of the most noble Lady Mary, late Queene of England. And the said most Christian King, hath promised, and doth promise aswell in his owne name, as in the name of the King Daulphin his sonne, his heires, and successors, for which Daulphin, the said most Christian King hath made himselfe, and doth make himselfe answerable, promising that hee will take care of, and effect that the said King Daulphin shall approue this treaty, and ratifie it, within two moneths after the date of this treaty, which said terme of eight yeeres being complete and ended, the said most Christian King his heires and successors shall presently without delay, relinquish, deliuer, and restore, or cause to be deliuered, and restored to the said most noble Prince Elizabeth, Queene of England, her heires, and successors, or to those that should bee thereunto deputed by her, or her heires and successors, the said towne of Callis, with the appertinances and appendices aforesaid, and all other and singular places aforesaid, and also the Towers, Castles, and fortresses whatsoeuer in the aforesaid parts, and also the places now of late builded, fortified, or reedified during the said terme of eight yeeres; and the said most Christian King his heirs and successors shall leaue the possession of all the said places, and depart from it, and wholly forsake the same. So that the most noble Lady Queene Elizabeth, her heires and successors may peaceably enioy, and quietly hold the possession of them, with al the rights, priuiledges, preeminences, superiorities, recognitions, and all other authorities in the like manner, state, condition and nature, in which the Kings of England haue held them, and possessed them before the beginning of this last warre. Prouided notwithstanding, and expresly couenanted, that the said most Christian King, his heires and successors shall not be bound to restore or deliuer the Townes and Fortresses, and places aforesaid, otherwise then in the same state, manner, and condition, in which now at this present they are, and hereafter shall be strengthened and fortified by them, during the said terme, yet so notwithstanding as neither in the time of such restitution nor before, that there be not any thing done of set purpose, whereby the former state of the strengthes, and fortifications which now it is in, or which hereafter added, by them, bee in any wise minished, broken, or ouerthrowne, but that all things without fraude, bee restored intire and vnimpaired, in maner aforesaid.

Also it is couenanted and agreed, that during the terme of the said eight yeeres, it shall neither bee lawfull for the said Christian King, nor for the said most fortunate King and Queene of Scots, nor for the said most happy Queene of England to innouate, attempt, or enterprise by warre any thing against each other, or for any one of them against the other, or against the Kingdomes, proper dominions, and Subiects of each other, either directly or indirectly, to the preiudice of this present treatise, &c. And likewise if any thing shall bee so innouated and attempted by the said most Christian King, and most happy King and Queen of Scots, or the subiects of them, by the authority, commandement, and approbation of them, or any of them. Then the said most Christian King, and King Daulphin, their heires and successors, by such kinde of innouation attempted, vpon the deed done, shall bee bound and obliged to leaue and depart from the possession and occupation of the said Towne of Callis, and of all other places aforesaid on this side the sea, taken of late from the English, by the said most Christian King. And all those things they shall deliuer and restore without any delay to the said most worthy Queene of England, in the same maner and forme, in which at the said terme of eight yeeres, they were promised and couenanted to be restored; which restitution if it shall not be so made, the said Merchants and pledges shall be bound to pay the said penalty of fiue hundred thousand Crowns to the said most worthy Queen of England, and the couenant notwithstanding of restoring the said Towne shall neuertheless remaine in force. Moreouer if any of the Subiects of any of the Princes aforesaid, of their owne authority, shall endeauour or attempt any thing against the subiects of either of the said Princes in preiudice of this Treatise, he shall be punished as an infringer of the peace, according to the quality of the fact.

These couenants notwithstanding they were sealed and sworne vnto, yet were neuer performed at the yeeres of expiration, though Marchants were bound, and hostages assigned to remaine in England till the money were paid.

(9) So suspiciously had this Towne of Callis beene recouered from the English, that the Lord Wentworth (the Deputie) was indited in Queene Maries daies, and now arraigned at Westminster; the Marquesse of Northampton being his Iudge, and Lord Chiefe Steward of England for that day; but that Nobleman so nobly defended himselfe, that he was acquitted by his Peeres, and wan a most honourable opinion for his many and faithfull seruices.

English aire from all Papall infection, and eſtabliſhed Peace, the greateſt benefit for the Subiect; on the fourteenth of May, being Whitſunday, Diuine Seruice began to be celebrated in the Engliſh tongue, whereby Gods Trumpet might bee heard in a perfect ſound; and the praiers of the Congregation vttered with an vnderſtanding heart. To the end therefore that the Clergy, the Teachers of others, ſhould not be infected themſelues, the Oath of Supremacy, with other Articles, was offered vnto them, the refuſers whereof were forthwith depriued, and others ſurrogated that were more loially affected. In place of Poole deceaſed, Doctor Parker was conſecrated Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and of Yorke, Doctor Younge in ſteade of Heth, who refuſed the Oath; and ſo of ſome others: then went foorth Commiſſioners to ſuppreſſe thoſe Monaſteries reſtored by Queene Marie, and to caſt out thoſe Images ſet vp in Churches, whoſe ſight hauing heated the blinde zeale of many poore ignorant people in places of Oratory, were now themſelues in the ſtreets conſumed in the fire, at whoſe flames might be ſaid, as in Iſaiah touching peeces of like ſtuffe, had beene ſaid: I am warme, I haue beene at the fire.

But theſe her bleſſed beginnings in England were little as it ſeemeth to the liking of the French King, Whoſe hope (ſaith Leſlie) by certaine acts of Parliament made by Queene Marie againſt her ſiſter the Lady Elizabeth to debarre her from the ſucceſſion of the Crowne, was to eſtabliſh Queene Marie of Scotland, who had lately married Prince Dolphine his ſonne, laying her title from Margaret the eldeſt daughter of King Henrie the ſeuenth, linked in Marriage with Iames the fourth King of that name, ſhee being the daughter of King Iames the fifth his ſonne. And therefore as the neereſt in blood, and lawfull heire to the Crowne of England, he cauſed by Proclamation in Paris her Stile to bee publiſhed vnder the name of Mary Queene of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and cauſed the Armes of England to bee ioined with Scotland and France, which the Dolphine and ſhee did impale, both in their Seales, Plate, Tapiſtrie, and other adornements; which cauſed great troubles (ſaith hee) betwixt the Kingdomes of England, France, and Scotland.

Articles propoſided to Scotiſh Biſhops and Peeres.

(14) To the two firſt, the Biſhops alleaging the cuſtomes of the Romane Church, would in no wiſe conſent, leauing euery man at liberty priuately to pray in what language he beſt liked; and the election of their Biſhops to the preſcription of the Canon Law, and to the appointment of their Queene. For the two latter, they affirmed, no better order could be preſcribed then that of their Common Law, which impoſeth vpon them, aſmuch as was required; and thereupon they began to put the ſame in execution, commanding all that had charge of ſoules to fit themſelues to their functions, otherwiſe to looke for no fauour from depriuation, after the terme of ſixe moneths. Which was (ſaith the ſame Author) the principall cauſe, that a great number of young Abbots, Priors, Deacons, and beneficed men, did aſſiſt the enterprize, and practiſed deuiſes for the ouerthrow of the Catholike Religion.

For to runne his laſt (and indeed his laſt) courſe in fauour of his Queene, he ſent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery, with a command to haue him enter the Tilt; but hee excuſing himſelfe from running againſt his Maieſtie, alleaged, that fortune the day before, afforded him not to breake one ſtaffe, and that now (as he feared) ſhe would put him to a ſecond ſhame; but the King, deſtiny ſo enforcing, and his date fully runne, ſent him a ſecond command, which Montgomery very vnwillingly obeyed, and breaking his Lance vpon the Kings Cuiraſſe, a ſplinter thereof, his Beauer being ſomewhat open, ſtroke him ſo deepe in the eie, that thereupon ſhortly hee ended his life.

He hearing of the troubles raiſed there, in caſe of Religion, ſent Mounſieur de la Broche to ſtrengthen the Field, and the Biſhop of Ameans to aſſiſt the Queene Regent, with his farre reaching and inſeeing counſell. Surely the preparation to withſtand them was great, and the combinators many that ſtood for Reformation, as namely, one Duke, foureteene Earles, and eleuen Lords, beſides other of name and account; but knowing their Aduerſaries forces, and ſeeing thoſe ſtrangers to poſſeſſe diuers of their Townes and Forts, to the oppreſſing of the Kingdome vnder forraigne ſubiectiō, they were enforced to become Petitioners vnto Queene Elizabeth, for aide to expell the French, who ſought the ſubuerſion of the Realmes ſtate.

(18) The Magnanimous Queene, nothing fearing the threats of that potent Nation, nor liking ſuch neighbours as formerly profeſſed to rob her of her right, and now vnder pretence of ſuppreſsing the Scots, were not vnlikely to attempt an inuaſion vpon her Realme; (for ſo the Almanes hired by the French were told they ſhould doe) gaue them aſsiſtance vpon Articles aſſured; whereof one was, that they ſhould hold faithfull concurrence with England during the life of the French King, and one yeere after. For the performance whereof, fiue young Gentlemen were ſent into England; and the Duke of Norfolke into the North, who from Barwicke diſpatched the Lord Gray of Wilton for Generall into Scotland, accompanied with many worthy Captaines, ſixe thouſand foot, and one thouſand two hundred and fifty horſemen; theſe comming to Salt-Preſton were

The Queene Regent desires conference.

(19) From thence they marched toward Lesterike, where a Trumpet from the Queene Regent met them with a safe conduct for Sir Iames Croft, and for Sir George Howard, with sixe other Gentlemen to accompany them vnto her presence in the Castell of Edenborough; vnto which the Generall and the Scotish Lords agreed, with an abstinence from Armes during the conference. But the French (the meane while) vnder the command of Monsieur Deisell issued foorth of Leith, and in good array took the field, which when the Lord Gray perceiued, he sent an Harold vnto them, willing them to depart till the English were returned, according to the order betwixt their Regent and him; but they returned him answer, they were on their Mistresses ground, which they meant to make good, and therupon discharged a whole volley of shot vpon the English Army.

The French disturbe the intended parley.

(20) The Allarum thus giuen when least it was expected, a cruell skirmish beganne, wherein died of the French about seauenscore persons, the rest were enforced backe into Leith, and many of the English both hurt and slaine. Whereupon they intrenched the Crag, and planted their Ordinance against Leith, vpon whose Steeples the French had mounted their great Canons, whence their Bullets flew amaine; and ere long a bold attempt was vndertaken by them, who with fiftie horsemen and fiue hundred Harquebusiers issued out of Leith, and assailed the English new trenches with such valour, as they entred, & a while possessed the same; where they tooke Maurice Barkeley prisoner, wonne his ensigne, cloyed the touch-holes of three great peeces, and slew no small numbers of their resisters.

The French assayle the English

(21) The English by this time had armed themselues (for this assault was vnexpectedly giuen) and Captaine Vaughan with his, brauely entred the Trench, who being seconded by Captaine Sommerset, Reade, and Arthur Grey, recouered the same with some slaughter of men, the Ordinance from Leith discharging vpon them to the great annoyance of their honourable seruice; and now being Masters of what was late lost, they cleared the great Ordinance which the French had stopped, and cast a new Trench along by the old Chappell, whence with their great Peeces they beate downe the Steeples of Saint Anthony and Saint Nicholas in Leith, and dismounted the Peeces that therein lay leuelled against them.

The English regayne their Trenches.

(22) In the full course of which dissentions, the Queene mother, Regent of Scotland (a Lady of excellent endowmentes of minde) consumed with thoughts, displeasures and Melancholy, departed this life in Edenbrough Castell: the Lords waxing stronger, and Leith much weaker through extremity of famine, and the French King, (the onely pillar on whome their strength did consist) not able to assist them. Who being brought daily into feares through new tumults arising, and increased in his owne Country of Amboise, was forced (saith Leslie) to yeeld vp all the Dominions, both of France, and of Scotland, vnto Pope Pius the fourth, to bee at his command and defence; but his Holinesse fearing his owne tottering estate, like a wise man, that meant to warpe no more then he could well weane, suffered king Francis to seek for other redresse, which hee did from her, that was more willing and better able to giue him content.

(24) These falling in conference concluded finallie vpon certaine Articles, whereof those that concerned England were these: That neither the King of France nor his Queene of Scotland, should thenceforth vse the Armes or titles of England or Ireland, and that all letters sealed with those Armes should bee called in within sixe monethes space: that both the English and French should depart Scotland, some few excepted, employed vpon occasions; and that a generall pardon should bee enacted by Parliament concerning all such as had beene in these stirres. Which Parliament was assembled at Edenbrough in August following. These things accomplished, an Ambassage of thankes was solemnly addressed vnto Queen Elizabeth by the Earles of Morton, Glencarne, and the young Laird of Lethington, with proffer that the Earle of Arran, the greatest Lord in account among them, should be at her dispose for marriage, which (as they well hoped) wold be to her selfe.

(25) With the like conceiued hope the yeere before, Iohn Duke of Finland, second sonne to Gustabus King of Sweden, was sent to her by his father, to treate a marriage for his elder brother Ericus, who was most honourably entertained, but dismissed without all hope of his suite. Notwithstanding, Gustabus being dead, Ericus now raigning King of Sweden, hauing imprisoned his brother Iohn, solicited her Maiesty the second time, but to his dishonour as it fell out, for his suite reiected in the English Court, hee attempted to match with the youngest daughter of Philip Lantgraue of Hassia, who hearing that hee had twice receiued deniall in England, denied him also with some disgrace, giuing his daughter vnto Adolfe Duke of Holst, vncle vnto Fredericke King of Denmarke, at that time enemy to Ericus.

For whose reconciliation Queene Elizabeth sent Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales; vnto which her endeauours, howsoeuer the French gaue countenance in Court, yet on the Seas they tooke her Merchants shippes, imprisoned the men, and seized their goods, no other cause alleaged but that they were Hugonets.

But most especially the cause of Religion (the onely pretended motiue of all these disturbances) together with the solicitations of the French themselues (as from Roan, Deip and Newhauen) moued her Maiesty first to set forth her greeuances publikely in print, and next to send aide vnto Monsieur Vidame Captaine of Newhauen, against such as sought to subuert both religion and the Estate.

For albeit that many manly feates were therein performed by the Engliſh, and the place ſtored with prizals of wines; yet wanting freſh victuall, but eſpecially freſh water, which the enemy had cut off, the calamities were great, and much more augmented by a contagious peſtilence that ſlew many more thē did either famine or ſword; ſo that the Engliſh hauing poſſeſt the Towne for eleuen monethes ſpace, now were conſtrained to ſurrender it vpon compoſition; bringing thence many ſicke ſouldiers that dangerouſly infected England with a long continuing plague.

(31) Times motion in England now moued only with the benefite of peace, and no act memorable to commit vnto hiſtory; let vs ſupply this Interim with looking a little into the ſtate of Religion in France; as wee haue ſeene, and ſomewhat touched the proceedings thereof both in England and Scotland. The Goſpell ſpreading farre in that faire Continent, the impugners tooke occaſions to raiſe many ſtirres, and all in ſhew to race out new hereſies as they accuſed & called the reformed doctrine. For which cauſe the French Townes burning in the flames of ſeditions, the Proteſtants bloud was thought fitteſt to quench them, & the rapines committed vpon chaſt wiues and virgines, was pretended to bee canceld by a marriage wrought and contracted betwixt two Princes of the bloud: which were Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Nauarre, a fauourer of the Goſpell, and Margaret of Valois the third daughter of King Henry the ſecond, and ſiſter vnto King Charles now raigning, a Princeſſe much deuoted to the Romiſh Religion. (32) This match was plotted by the Marſhall of Coſſe, and the Maſter of Requeſts, with the deuiſe no doubt of ſome in higher place, who wrought the Queene of Nauarre, vnder the pretence of great affection, that the French King bare vnto her; and the Chaſtillon Admirall (a moſt zealous Proteſtant) vnder an intent of imployment for the defence of the Low Countries, againſt the King of Spaine. This match indeed ſeemed to confirme a publike concorde, only the Popes diſpenſation muſt bee had by reaſon of pretended conſanguinity of the parties, the one being petty Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the firſt King of France. And the Queen of Nauarre made ſome ſcruple of the Ceremonies for the celebration, place and Church; but ciuill reaſon ouerſwaying all difficulties, the Theater muſt be Paris, as the Capitall City, and the marriage acted without any change of Ceremony, or of royall forme.

And the Admiral for his part thinking all vpright, to that end moueth the King to treat a peace with the Queen of England to the preiudice of the Spaniards: with theſe motiues among others; that Elizabeth was vnmarried, and Henry Duke of Anion had no wife, the dignity of ſo high an alliance was honourable for the Duke, and the quality of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by the Queene; he hauing in his yong yeeres purchaſed great honour and reputation.

The foord thus ſounded by the well meaning Admirall, ſeemed the more ſafely paſſable: for the two Queenes of England and Nauarre; the firſt of them granting the Peace ſo deſired, and the other without all iealouſie repaired to the French Court; where eighteene dayes after her arriuall, of a quotidian feuer ſhee died, though others ſaide not without ſuſpition of poyſon by the perfume of a paire of Gloues preſented vnto her.

At which traiterous attempt the King and Queene-mother ſeemed to bee greatly perplexed, viſiting him with all expedition, and for his further ſafety commanded all his fauourers (the Proteſtants) to bee lodged, neere about him. But the night now approached, Coſſeines brake into his Baſe-Court, and three of his Company entring his Bed-chamber, with their weapons barbarouſly murthered him, whoſe goared body at Guizes command, they caſt out of the Window, Guize himſelf wiping the bloud from his face, acknowledged him to be the man. His head they cut off, and preſented to the Queene-mother, and ſhee balming it, ſent it to her Holy Father for an aſſurance of the death of his moſt capitall enemy.

On the other ſide, the ſhoutes of the murtherers preuailed, ſaying, that this one day ſhold end the quarrell, which neither penne, paper, decrees of Iuſtice, nor open warre for twelue yeeres together could euer doe. Lamentable was the ſpectacle of thoſe ſacred and maſſacred carkaſes ſtrowed in the ſtreetes, the pauements, market-places and riuers dyed with their bloud, and that Saboth made direfull, and to the Papiſts infamous, with the bloudy pollution of ten thouſand Innocents, in the ſtain whereof we will leaue them, and returne our ſtile againe for England.

For in the troublesome times of Robert Brus, when his brother Edward named himselfe King of Ireland, Donenald O-Neale, rowsed out of his lurking holes, in his missiue letters vnto the Pope, stileth himselfe King of Vlster, and in right of inheritance the vndoubted heire of all Ireland. But his glorious shew being clowded before it was seene, his posterity puld in their hornes like snailes, vntill the firebrandes of Ciuill dissentions betwixt the Houses of Lancaster and Yorke, gaue light to their footing, whilest the English left Vlster vnto their custody, and followed in England the faction which they best fauoured.

From the bed of these Cosen-germanes, issued Con O-Neale, surnamed Bacco, because he halted; who was so right Irish, that hee cursed all his posterity, in case they either learned the English language, sowed wheate, or built them houses, least the first should breed conuersation, the second Commerce of sustenance, and with the last they should speede as the Crowe that buildeth her nest to bee beaten out by the Hawke.

Whose humble submission so satisfied this crowned bird, that his life was deliuered out of his claw, and letters Pattents granted vnder the Great Seale of England, to hold his reuenewes in Fee of the King, together with the Title of Earle of Tir-Oen, to him and to Mathew his false reputed son, and to the heires of their bodies lawfully begotten, at what time the said Mathew was created Baron of Dungannon.

(41) Shan then chosen proclai med, and inaugured O-Neale, by an old shooe cast ouer his head, seized vpon his fathers inheritance, and with all diligence sought after the sonnes of Mathew, to secure himselfe of that which he had got. Brian the eldest he caused to be slaine by Mac Donnel Totan, one of the Oneals race, but Hugh and Cormack by meanes of the English escaped his hands. Thus seated in Vlster he beganne to tyrannize ouer the great men of that prouince, accounting them his Subiects, as in his answeres vnto the English Iusticiar, expostulating with him vpon that point, he laid his Title.

(42) That hee was the vndoubted sonne and heire of Con-Oneale, borne of his lawfull wife; and that Mathew his supposed brother, was the sonne of a Blacke-smith borne in Dundalke, and vnto the age of fifteene yeeres had beene so reputed and taken; that then hee was obtruded vpon Con, by the said Smiths wife, whom hee had formerly kept for his Concubine, with an intent to interuert the inheritance and honour of the O-Neale another way. That his surrender vnto King Henrie of England, was of no validity, considering that Con had no longer therein then his owne life, neither could that lawfully bee done without the consent of the Nobles of Vlster, by whom he had beene elected O-Neale. That himselfe was by Law both of God and man, the onely true heire, being the first begotten sonne of his father, lawfully borne in Wedlocke, chosen, declared and proclaimed O-Neale, by the generall consent of the Peeres and People of Vlster, and that according to the ancient law Tanistry, whereby a man at his full yeeres is to be preferred before a boy, and an vncle before a nephew, whose Grandfather suruiued the father, and lastly, that hee had done nothing, but what he had sufficient authority to doe, and which his ancestors had not vsed before him to doe.

In which his doings he drew vpon himselfe their hatreds and complaints; and he whose nature could disgest neither, fell furious for reuenge vpon Mac-Guir, Lord of Fermanagh, fired Armach the Metropolitane City, laid siege vnto Dundalke, and harried the Countrey on euery side.

Callis demanded of the French King. April 28. 1567.

(47) The time now expired for retention of Callis ſo ſore thirſted after, and ſo thirſtingly kept; Queene Elizabeth preſently ſent vnto Charles the French King, to demand the deliuery according to couenants. He ſet in eſtate, accompanied with the Queene mother and others, the Engliſh Embaſſadors had audience, and the Title controuerſed among them as followeth. The Queenes Letters read and attendance giuen what would more be ſaid: Sir Thomas Smith (for he was the man) demanded in her Maieſtes name, the Towne of Callis, the Forts, and other the appurtenances, the Caſtle and Towne of Guize, and generally all ſuch Caſtles, Townes, and places as had beene taken by his Father Henry, the late French King in his laſt warres, from Marie late Queene of England, her Maieſties ſiſter: which in a Treatie of peace made at Caſteau in Cãbreſis the yeere of Chriſt, 1559. was agreed vpon, that his Soueraign, Queen Elizabeth ſhould permit the ſaid French King and his ſucceſſors to poſſeſſe, and peaceably to enioy the ſaid Townes, Caſtles, and places, the ſpace of 8. yeeres, and thoſe expired the ſaid K. Henry couenanted for himſelfe and Succeſſors to deliuer the ſame intirely vnto the Engliſh, which being compleat and ended the ſecond of that preſent moneth April, himſelfe with Sir Henry Norris her Maieſties Ambaſſadors vpon the third day of the ſame month demanded in her name the poſſeſſion thereof accordingly, but could not attaine or get ſpeech, either with Lieutenant or Gouernour. Whereupon they were inforced to make repaire to his maieſty, whom hee doubted not but would accompliſh the performance, and likewiſe keepe perpetuall amity with his Soueraigne Lady and Miſtreſſe.

The Towns Gouernours would not be ſpoken with.

King Charles ſpeech to the Ambaſſadors.

(48) King Charles but young, and altogether gouerned by the Queene-mother, hauing well learned his leſſon, made preſent anſwer, That Callis was his, and that none had right thereunto but himſelfe, neither ſhould any deliuer it to any other, and that the Treaty, named by the Engliſh Ambaſſador, did wholly giue it him. Whereunto Sir Thomas replied, That neither her Maieſty nor Counſell did ſo take it, nor indeed could, the words of the Treaty being ſo plaine and manifeſt. Why, Maſter Smith, quoth the Queene-mother, I maruell the Queene your Miſtreſſe would now ſend for ſuch a purpoſe, and eſpecially you, who knoweth none better, how all things haue paſſed: you know that your Queene hath forfeited Callis, and all her rights in thoſe places diuers waies. As firſt, by inuading the Kings Subiects in Scotland, then moſt manifeſtly at New-hauen, where the King, my ſonne, was faine with an whole Army to recouer it; and in the ſaid Treaty was an Article as hath beene diſputed; that if the Queene of England ſhould inuade any part of my ſonnes Dominions, ſhe ſhould foorthwith loſe her right in Callis.

Obiections againſt the Q. of England.

Anſwers to the French obiections.

(49) Madame, ſaid Sir Thomas: King Henrie and his ſucceſſors were bound to loſe Callis, if they inuaded England, and yet did King Francis brother to the King heere, doe it by the way of Scotland, as is moſt manifeſt, after the ſaid Treaty at Caſteau, not onely in aſſuming the Armes and Title of England and Ireland, but contrary to the Article of Peace, which concluded that both Engliſh and French ſhould depart Scotland: which incontinently her Maieſty performed, in reuoking thence her Lieutenant, Captaines, and Souldiers: whereas contrariwiſe Monſieur D'oiſell their Chieftaine abode therein ſtill, and the French power daily augmented vnder the conduct of Monſieur de Martigues, and de-la-Broſſe, and alſo by an other great Commander, whoſe Nauie was diſperſed by tempeſt, and whoſe ſtrength his ſhipwracke did teſtifie, in Holland, Zeland, Norway and Denmarke, by the loſſe of Armour, Men and Munition: to let paſſe * Britaigne and Normandy, then in preparing to inuade England; and Lantzknights likewiſe hired in Saxony, and the Land of Lunenburge to aſsiſt the French in that enterpriſe, when theſe Almanes according to their nature loth to take Seas, and deſirous to know whither their ſeruice intended, were told, they ſhould no further then Scotland, and to the Land adioyning, which was plentifull of gold, ſiluer, and all kind of wealth, and where no Almane Souldier had made ſpoile for the ſpace of an hundred yeeres before, and to ſome of them in plain termes it was told, that they ſhould into England; which was likewiſe ſignified vnto her Maieſty, both from her neighbour Princes, warning her highneſſe to take good heede vnto her ſelfe; as alſo by letters intercepted, that declared their intents; whereof ſhee did not onely admoniſh Mounſieur de Seure then Ambaſſador in England for France; but alſo by her Ambaſſador to the French King, praying him to deſiſt from ſuch attempts ſo preiudiciall to her Highneſſe, and ſo directly againſt the treaty of Peace. To colour which matter the ſaid de Seure made a Proteſtation in print, the anſwer whereunto is likewiſe printed in Engliſh, French, Italian, and Latine, wherein may appeare the Hiſtory of that time. And ſince her Maieſty hath had a more manifeſt proofe by men which are yet aliue. For when the moſt part of the French power was arriued in Scotland, the Queene Mother, Monſieur de Oiſell, and Monſieur de Martigues called the Scotiſh Lords with their Forces vnto Aimouth beſides Barwicke; where they declared that their minde was to inuade England; and to giue to the King and Queene the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Crowne; of which they now had the Titles and Armories. But the Lords of Scotland vpon conſultation, made anſwer, That they had often attempted to inuade England, but they neuer got any good thereby; further affirming, it was againſt the peace newly concluded and ſworne: ſo neere was it to execution. Vpon this there followed a treaty of peace at Edenborough, wherein the numbers of French Souldiers were to be leſſened; the Stile and Armes of England left downe, and the treaty of Caſteau renewed and confirmed: all which may appeare by the hands of them which were Commiſsioners, authorized by the French King vnder his Great Seale: which treaty when it was ſigned with all the Commiſsioners hands, the Queene my Soueraigne for the loue of peace being contented to ſeale and ſwear; the ſaid King Francis did refuſe thē both, ſith which refuſall her Maeſty doth, and hath alwaies taken that the right of Callis both propriety and poſſeſsion was deuolued vnto her by reaſon of the attempt, and hath demanded it diuers times, yet was content to ſtay the time of compoſition; which now being clearely expired, it muſt needs bee hers, and cannot iuſtly be denied.

The French charged with hard dealings.

The French King refuſed to ſwear to the peace.

(50) Why (ſaid the Queene) all this while you haue ſaid nothing againſt the King my ſonne, why he ſhould forfait it; hee hath done nothing: and is the bearing of your Armes ſo great a matter with you? you beare the Armes and ſtile of ours, and ſo do many, beare others Armes alſo. No Madam ſaid Sir Thomas Smith, the bearing of the Armes is not ſo great a matter, but that with other things doe declare the intent, and the attempt maketh the right forfeited by the treaty. And though the King your ſonne did not forfeit it, yet the right being once loſt from France, and accrewed to the Queene of England, how ſhould it goe from her again? All this while (ſaid the Queene Mother) you ſpeake but of the King of Scotland, who did it in his wiues right, and there you muſt aske your amends, and not here, you heare what my ſonne ſaith, and euery man ſeeth the right is his, your Queene hath forfeited it, and therefore I maruell my good ſiſter will ſtand in it, or ſend to demand it. This is the anſwere ſaid Sir Thomas which I ſhal carry to the Queene my Soueraigne. That? Nay, ſaid the King, I will talke with my Councell, and then ſhall you haue a reſolute anſwere. Then were the Engliſh Ambaſſadors deſired to abſent themſelues a while, and within an howre after wereſent for againe.

* An Addition taken out of a former treatiſe written by Sir Thomas Smith.

The cause for Callis debated before the French King and his Counsell.

(51) The King set in Councell with the Queen Mother, the Dukes of Anion, Alanson, Monpencier, Aumale, and Neuers, the Cardinals of Bourbon and Chastillon, the Bishops of Orleance and Lymoges, Monsieur de Valence and others, the Ambassadors of England were placed in the middest: vnto whom the Queene spake and said, Monsieur L' Ambassador I pray you say your minde before the King and his Councell here assembled: which Sir Thomas Smith presently did in the same forme as hee had done before, adding with all, that this demand was grounded vpon the lapse of the time, by which without all controuersie after eight yeeres Callis was due to the Queene of England, and that by right, both the propriety, and the possession thereof was inuested vnto her long ago, by the forfeiture made by the attempt in Scotland, by the commandement and consent of Francis the second to inuade England, seeing the King did not ratifie the treatie made at Edenborough.

Callis forfeited by Couenant.

(52) Monsieur de Valence said the Queene Mother, I pray you answere that, whereupon he standing vp saide, my selfe was sent to that treaty of peace, and am glad to heare Monsieur L' Ambassador confesse that the bearing of the English Armories was but a small matter, & yet was that the chiefest thing imputed by their side, as for the men of warre, they were not aboue fiue thousand at the most, sent indeed because of a rebellion (for so must I tearme it in plaine tearmes) then risen there. But the English men were aboue fifteen thousand that came against them at Petty-Lith. There was sent thither also the Bishoppe of Amiens with the Popes Bulles, to reduce them againe to the Religion Romane. And as touching these matters I spake with your Queene as I came throgh England, and offered her as much at the first as was done in that Treaty, if shee would breake the League betwixt her and the Scotish Lords, which were Rebels. But shee said shee could not. Now for the ratification and confirmation of that Treaty which was signed with my hand and others: there should haue come into France certain Scotish Lords to haue agreede and sworne to certain Articles, which did deferre to come till the King was sore sicke, and could not attend them, who shortly after died, and so the Treaty was not ratified. And he being dead the King that now is, had nothing to doe to ratifie it: for the matters therein touched Scotland, and their Queenes doings and titles, which appertained nothing at all vnto him.

Monsieur de Valence.

The Romane religion a chiefe cause of these stirres.

(53) To whom Sir Thomas replied and said, I am not ignorant that the Article saith, Armis innouare, attentare aut moliri, and doe not take Armis to signifie Armories. But the Armes that I meant to weigh the most, and the attempt with them done was the Armed men, and the good Captaines whom I named D'Oisel, Brosse, Martigues, and others, their Ensignes and Companies, marry the Armories and Titles did disclose the intent and meaning. And if there had beene none other but them which the Bishop brought, and none other munition but the Popes Bulles; Queene Elizabeth should not haue needed to haue armed so many Shippes, not sent so many Souldiers to haue let their enterprise, nor would euer haue complained of it: but it was farre otherwise as I haue declared. As for the league you speake of with the Rebels of Scotland, I thinke there was none, and the euent did shew what Rebels they were. But this I thinke they were as weary to haue so many of you there, as wee were weary to haue you so neere vs. And therein I thinke the Queenes Maiesty and they did agree. And to excuse the refuse of the ratification, by the not comming in of the Scotish Lords, hath small reason to beare it: for the Treaty made betwixt the French King then, and the Queene of England might haue been ratified notwithstanding, whatsoeuer was betwixt him and the Scotish Lords his Subiects: for our fact and peace did not stand vpon their doings; which Treaty because it was not ratified, I say, the Queene my Soueraignes title to the possession of Callis, by reason of that attempt standeth whole and entire vnto her.

Sir Tho. Smith.

The Scotish Lords scandalized.

But sir said he (speaking to the King) to say the truth I haue no commission, nor any commandement or authority to dispute or answere in these matters, but onely to demand Callis and the other fortresses, and places according to the Treaty, which is so plain, that to mine opinion there needs bee no controuersie. And if there bee any doubt, now the time expired doth put it out of all doubt. But because you and the Queene haue charged mee that I know so much of the matter, as I cannot deny somewhat I doe, as hauing beene at the doing of a great deale & the dispute; Somwhat I must, and may say for my selfe, lest it should bee thought that there were nothing to bee said. Marry as I said, as Commissioner from the Queene my Soueraigne, I haue nothing to say, but the demands onely, the matter being plain and in right iudgement, without controuersie; and also that I see no person here but such as be parties, and no competent person to bee iudge of the controuersie. Whereunto the Constable replyed and saide, Who should bee iudge of that which is the Kings but himselfe? it is his, and none could take or giue it to any other but himselfe: with that the Queene mother asked Monsieur Chancelier, why hee did not speake.

No Commission to argue the title but to demand Callis.

The Constable.

Queen Mother.

(54) Who after some pause beganne a long and well composed oration, the sum wherof was this; That the present Kings right to Callis was long before any claime could be made thereunto by the English, which was not much aboue two hundred yeeres, and then was it got by the fortune of warre; but more anciently, that it had beene the inheritance of France none can deny, as being vpon the Continent thereof, and not vpon any English ground. King Edward (quoth he) wee grant wan it, and your father noble King rewanne it to his Crown. But the English wil say they haue possessed and enioyed it many yeeres: Why so they did Aquitaine, Gascoigne, and Guyen, and other dominions besides, which they claimed by our Elioner, the repudiate of the King of France, who was inheritrix vnto it: indeed some titles they had, yet so as they held them of the Crowne of France: for the whole which is Gallia appertaineth to you sir our King: and so doth Callis which is of no great antiquity that I can read of: for Countie Boloigne was the first that did inclose it, being afore but a Burgard, as the most part of the Townes of France then were. At the battell of Cressy, dolorous to vs, King Edward of England after nine monethes siege by composition had it surrendred, the poor inhabitants pardoned of life at the great suit of his good Queene, else had they died euery mothers sonne, and so with white wands in their hands were expelled the towne: To whom the King of France was so mercifull, that hee commanded of euery thing vacant, they should bee the first prouided for. And I thinke when your Father King Henry tooke it, the English were likewise so serued. These claime two hundred yeers possession, the others before them, aboue fiue hundred yeeres: thus God doth to punish, or to essay his seruants. And although the English claimed Gascoigne, and Guyen, by succession of Elioner, although Normandy by one William; and Poutieur by a Dowry of their mother, daughter of Philip de Bel. Yet to Callis they had no right, but onely by Armes, and by Armes your Father againe recouered it. But some will say, by the peace at Bretigny, they haue right; I say no; for euery man knowes what exceptions were taken at that peace: and some, that so long a possession makes a prescription; I say no, for Prescription is among priuate men, but among Princes prescription cannot stand, and yet theirs was not much aboue two hundred, ours aboue eight hundred yeeres. But to you Monsieur L' Ambassador, I will say, that at the peace of Troes in Champaign, were your selfe and Monsieur Throgmorton, both of you most able in such affairs, and nothing therein done I doubt not without the Queen and Councels consent: no one word was spoken of Callis, which chiefly was the cause of the warre, so that all standeth clear for al which was then talked vpon, and it a plain confession, that they did acquit their right thereunto. This Article I say is translatiuus in the peace of Castleau in Cambresis, and is no more but such as forgetfulnesse, or because all small things cannot bee mentioned in conference. But Callis was the chiefe point, which being omitted, I say by meaning it was acquited. But now to your reasons Monsieur L' Ambassador, the Article for the losse of Callis at that treaty was forced in by you the English, who of all nations bee the most wary and circumspect in making their peaces. Whereupon the Queene of England layeth to vs a suspition, a iealousie, a conjecture, a gesse, that a King of France would haue invaded England. But euery suspition must not make a breake: for so whensoeuer any Prince should arme his men vpon iust occasion, his neighbours might say it was against him: And so doe you English lay gesses against the late King Francis the second. But the Queene of England with open face invaded the Kings Realme, with a goodly pretence to keepe the townes to the Kings vse, yet when al was reduced into their due obedience, she wold keep the town of Newhauen as a pledge for Callis, by which deed shee hath lost all her right in Callis, God indeed hath made a naturall separation betwixt you and vs, a sure wal of defence, Et penitus toto diuisos orbe Britannos. So that naturally you ought to haue nothing but peace and amity with ours. But doe not thinke Monsieur L' Ambassador that I say this as fearing what you can doe: for there was neuer any King of France since Charlemans so great as the King is now, had so many men of warre, so ready, and so good Souldiers: and yet his Highnesse doth desire the amity of the Queene of England, and the loue of that nation: of which there is the more hope, if all these pretences and demaunds were cancelled, and Callis forgotten, which hath beene the continuall pickequarrell betwixt these two Realmes. You neuer read Monsieur Smith, that the French euer invaded England, I speake it not to your dispraise which are English, but to your praise; yet this I thinke, had there not beene so easie a discent, so conuenient a place, and so ready, for you to make warre here, yee would not (as I suppose) haue come hither so often, and troubled our Country, nor the amity betwixt you and vs; And I dare boldly affirm and gage any thing, that the Queene of England shall gaine more by continuall peace with vs, then shee shall doe by Callis, & therefore your Queene must leaue off these demands and quarrels, and come to a perfect peace with vs, which shalbe more profitable for both the Realmes, and this I dare assure you, here is no Councellor among vs, that dare once open his mouth to render you Callis, for my part I will not be one to moue or assent thereunto. Nor I said the Constable, and so all the rest.

The French had rather make faults then see faults.

A faire shew to skar the English.

Callis a continual picke-quarrell.

The Constable.

(55) Then quoth Sir Thomas Smith, Monsieur Chancelier, mee thinkes you fetch your Title very farre to haue Callis, and howsoeuer the possession was comeby, by and by the right is his in possession, then by your reason all our disputation is in vaine, and it maketh no matter, bonâne an malâ fide possideat, the King once in possession as a thing returning to his primier estate postliminio or gotten of the enemy, yee admit no contract, or latter treaty, so as it doth appeare, yee open that which was thought of some men, and alwayes spoken, that what promise soeuer was made, the French would neuer render Callis againe to the English, but keepe it still, per ius, nefasque: this reasoning passeth all answere, for whatsoeuer the Queen of England had done quàm sanctè so euer shee had kept her treaty of this eight yeeres, though ye could obiect nothing against her, yet she should neuer haue had Callis restored; to this kind of reasoning and to that, that no man dare moue the King to render it being due, I cannot answere; but to this that toucheth my fact in the making of the Peace in Champaigne, where I must confesse, and am not ashamed, that I was a Minister, I doe not yet acknowledge that either I am worthy to bee accounted so wise as you would make mee, nor our Nations alwayes so circumspect in making Treatises with you, your owne Writers auerring otherwise, and giue you the prayse therein against vs. But for the point wherein you touch vs, that the peace at Troes should be nouatio contractus, and wee should thereby acquit our right of Callis, it is

Sir Tho. Smith.

The French all for themselues whatsoeuer they said.

Philip Comin.

Antistrophon, and turneth a great deale better vpon you. For if because our talke was of our right to Callis, by reason of the attempt in Scotland, you of the forfeiture of it by reason of the descent to Newhauen, neither condiscending to other, and not concluding thereupon, wee did agree vpon that Peace. And if that Peace doth make nouationem, then the forfeiture of our right by keeping Newhauen, which you impute to vs is wiped away, nouated and clensed by this Peace, and our right which was not yet in esse, & cuius dies nondum venit, remaineth still. So as it toucheth you rather then vs; and by this meanes haue you nothing to say against vs, but wee still our right against you. But the truth is, as Monsieur Le Conneſtable here can tell, who was part the occasion that wee came to it; for when this was contended, that Callis was already due vnto vs, you, that wee had forfaited it, so that wee could enter into no other Article of peace; why said you, haue not wee the wit to make a peace, and make no mention of Callis? neither to speake of it one way, nor other: your time is not yet come to ask it, let vs liue in peace in the meane while, and let each Prince haue right such as it is, reserued; whereupon you Monsieur L' Ambespine were one of the first that came with vs, and you know what passed.

The French the cause that Calis was not mentioned in the peace.

(56) Yea (saith he) but wee would neuer grant that it should bee put in, that you should haue Callis: you say true (said Sir Thomas) nor wee that the Queenes Maiesty should acquit it, nor the hostages neither. But in the end when it came to the Conclusion, as the Bishoppe of Orleans, and Monsieur Bourdin can tell, it was agreed that expresly the right bee reserued, aswell to that, as to any other thing, not expreslie there mentioned. Omnes aliæ petitiones & demandæ & similiter exceptiones & defensiones as appeareth by the Treaty. And as touching Newhauen, Monsieur Chancelier, note in it two things. The one, the first entrie, the other, the keeping after the peace agreed vpon amongst your selues. As for the first entrie, I deny that our men of warre made any invasion or came by force. But being requested and desired aide of a great number of Noblemen, and other who were in perill and danger. And whether did they like inuaders (I aske for all the time that they were not assayled) spoile any, or robbe any? no, they tooke not an henne or an egge, but they paide for it: I, if any complaine I offer to pay it: This is no invasion, nor no hostility: but the act of a friend, and at their requests and pursuits: whose doings sir, aswell for matter of Armes, as for other things done in that tumult, you haue declared by Edict to haue beene done à bon fin et pour vostre seruice, which may truly bee said, for by their means and defence a great number of your good Subiects, aswell men as women, aswell Captaines as Souldiers, of whom Monsieur le Chancellier did now boast, as of other not Souldiers, are saued now to doe you seruice: which else should haue been a prey and spoile to them which sought but the ruine of halfe or third part at the least of your Realme. For the conseruation of whom, yee in part may thanke the Queen my Mistresse. And this for the first discent of our men. Now where Monsieur Chancellier saith that the Queene my Mistresse changed her pretence, I still doe say shee kept her first protestation. That she would appropriate no Land, Towne, nor Fortresse of the Kings to her, nor shee did neuer claime Newhauen as hers, but comming peaceably into it, hauing beene at great charge and cost, it was both wisdome and reason all other being satisfied and content, shee should at the least haue some reason offered her in her right to Callis. And otherwise she did not hold Newhauen, which thing was manifestly declared at Gallion, where Articles were drawn not vnreasonable, and the matter so farre forward that they were signed with my hand, and tarried but for power and Commission to affirme them. But the mortality and pestilence growing so great in Newhauen,

The conditions reserued.

No hostile attempt in entring Newhauen.

The benefite accruing vnto the French by the aide of the English.

Newhauen, gaue too much aduantage, which was taken; and the reasonable dealings in this matter broke off, other meaning her Maiesty had none.

(57) No said the Constable, what meant such preparation, and prouision? I cannot skill of things; but in that arte wherein I haue been brought vp and exercised all my life, I can skill a little. There was such a number of Horse harnesse for the carte: such a number of Artillery, such prouisions of Gamons of Bacon, Cheese and other things, and aboue fiue thousand men, that am I sure went out of it, besides all those that were dead: can you make me beleeue that all this was for Newhauen alone? No Monsieur (said he) I know what belongeth to a Towne of Warre. Yea, said another, and the Ships also that came: Nay said the Constable they came too late. Why, said the Queene-mother smiling, will you make vs beleeue that all that preparation was for Newhauen alone?

(58) Wisdome would, Madam, quoth Sir Thomas Smith, because the sea and winde doe not serue at all times, that there should be good store of all manner of prouision. No, no (said shee) there was a further meaning, but as you haue quitted Newhauen, so must you quit Callis, and let vs be friends; neuer talke more of these demands, nor of the sums of money for which yee had Hostages. All is gone from you quite. Your Queene in comming to Newhauen hath quitted all. Shee must forget that matter cleane, and let vs be friends still. The King my sonne doth offer as much friendship as need to bee, but as for Callis ye must neuer speake of it. It is hard, Madame, said Sir Thomas Smith, for a man to forget his right, or not to remember a wrong offered. Nay, no wrong, said shee, you haue heard what Monsieur Le Chancellier hath said, and what all these of my sonnes Counsell doe say. Madame (quoth he) it is for the most part seene that men be partiall in their owne causes, I doe assure you, that the Queene my Soueraigne doth thinke that she hath as good right to Callis as to any Towne in England: and so doe all her Counsell: and whatsoeuer yee haue heard, I am able to say for her right euen out of hand, but they a great deale more. But Sir, quoth Sir Thomas, is this the finall answer I shall haue? Yea, said the King. That yee will not render Callis vnto her Maiesty, according to the Treaty, nor pay the fiue hundred thousand Crowns which is for the peine.

(59) No said the King, I will keepe them both according to the Treaty: well then said Sir Thomas I haue no more to say, but to bring this report to her Maiestie, which I shall be sorrie to doe: and thereupon himselfe, and Sir Henrie Norris, rose vp to depart, doing their obeisance. But you take not your leaue, Monsieur L'ambassadors for altogether said the Queene. Yes forsooth said Sir Thomas. Doe you intend to come no more at Court? No Madame, except the Kings Maiesty doe command me. But I am sorry to carry this answere so precise; and that there is so little regard of the Queene my Soueraignes right. No right, said the Queen, for if there were any, the King my sonne, would be loth to offer her any wrong: yee haue heard all the reasons, I marueil that you will take vpon you, you that are learned, to defend so vniust a cause. Ah Madame (said he) I see well, it is true on your part, that men bee blinde in their owne causes and aduantages. Surely (quoth she) the Queene (my good sister) shall haue more aduantage thus as it is, then to demand Callis. And I pray you perswade her. I Madame, against her right? You must not say so, I pray you commend me hartily to the Queene, my good sister, and desire her to keepe the amity and loue which is betwixt her and my sonne, and I shall bee ready to doe her what seruice or pleasure I can quoth the Queen and so said the King. Thus this conference ended, and Callis kept still by the French.

(60) Now as these distastures fell betwixt England and France, and these broken Couenants ministred occasions to set each against others: So at the same time, the affaires of Scotland was carried with so violent a motion as set the Lords at dissentions, and the land in ciuill sedition; so as not onely outrages were committed vpon the best Subiects, but euen vpon the vertuous King and Queene themselues, him they shamefully murdered in a most barbarous manner, and her they tooke prisoner, forced her to resigne gouernment, and lastly to flye into forraine parts for succour. But knowing that this Subiect is to be writ with a farre more noble pen, and our extant relations from vncertaine and suspected reports; we will surcease to intermeddle in the particulars of that Queenes affaires, excepting onely in such intercourses of State, as are wouen in ours, and cannot otherwise be auoided without maime of History; this onely in generall.

The King of Scots barbarously murthered.

The Queene of Scotland oppressed by her owne Subiects.

(61) Mary Queene of Scotland hauing imbarked her selfe for France, where shee well hoped to finde many friends; by contrary windes (accompanied with sixeteene persons) landed at Werkinton in Cumberland, and from thence was conueied to Carlile, to Bolton Castle, and lastly to the custody of the Earle of Shrewesburie. Whose troubles and misfortune, Q. Elizabeth both pitied and sought to redresse; writing in her behalf vnto the Regent of Scotland, and blaming the Lords of the many wrongs done to their Queen, which indeede were intollerable to roiall authoritie, and such, as other Princes could not but seeke to redresse, and reuenge; notwithstanding such was the distasture of those distempered Lords, or the frownes of those fatall times, that in England she remained euer after during her life.

(62) As the ielousies grew great betwixt these two great Queenes, Elizabeth and Mary, by the working instruments of the Pope, and forraine Princes; so by the like meanes, were the like discontents bred and nourished in some of the greatest English Peeres, towards their Soueraigne, whose Peace, vnder pretext of Religion, they irreligiously disturbed. Among these, the first in ranke, time and disloialtie, were the two Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland, who with Leonard Dacres, Neuil, Norton, Tempest, Danby, and others, purposed on the sudden to haue surprized the Earle of Sussex, the Queens Lieutenant of the North, in his house at Cawood; but therein prevented, they were enforced to keepe secret their intents, till some fit occasion should chance to be ministred. They had in readinesse against their rising, certaine English Priests, Morton, and others, with Bulles and instruments of absolution, reconciliation, and taking of Oathes to the Pope and his doctrine, which was not so secretly done, but that Queene Elizabeths vigilant Counsellors had an inkling thereof.

The Popes instruments nourished discontents in the English towards their Soueraigne.

The Earles of Northumberland and Westmorland in Rebellion.

Morton a Popish Priest aduanceth the Rebellion with Papall Bulles.

(63) Thomas Percie, (so was Northumberlands Earle named) lying at his Castle of Topcliffe in Yorkeshire, had gone so farre in his intended purposes, as he could not returne; who being sent for vnto the Court, stroke a great amazement and sudden feare into the other conspirators hearts: and his own guilty minde was much more distracted, vpon notice that some forces were approching for his apprehension; whereupon all affrighted, he rose from his bed, and caused the Bels to bee rung in a most confused manner, so that the Townesmen raised, all sought to defend and follow him their chiefe Lord.

Nouem. 14.

(64) The nest thus broken before the birds could well flye, he departed to Branspeth, where hee met with Charles Neuill Earle of westmorland, and his following consorts; who ioining in Counsell, made no conscience to vndoe many true subiects, and innocent men: For abusing the Queenes name in their Proclamations and Commissions, they commanded the Countrey to follow them in Armes; sometimes pretending the safety of her Maiesties person, in danger (they said) by Treasons in working; and sometimes in case of Conscience for restoring their former Religion, which if themselues should neglect, other forraigne Princes (said they) would doe, to the no little perill of the Realme.

The pretenses of the Rebels.

(65) In this zeale they hasted to Durham, with as forward an intent as Ieroboam did to Bethel, to set vp vp his golden Calues, where they rent and tare the Bible, in as great a contempt, as Ioachim did the rowle that Ieremy wrote: at Darington they besprinkled their Host with holy water, for feare of spirits, and at Rippon heard Masse, to forward their Treason, with the assistance of that Propitiatory Sacrifice. Whence, with Banners displaid, they entred Borowbrigge, old Norton being their Ancient, whose Ensigne was the Crosse, and fiue wounds of our Lord.

The strength of the Popish Rebels.

(66) From thence they went to Tadcaster, Wetherby, and Bramham Moore, where they mustered sixteene hundred Horsemen, and foure thousand footemen, intending therewith to march vnto Yorke. But their mindes altering, they fell vpon Barnards Castle, which after eleuen daies resistance, was yeelded vnto them: which fortunate entrance did so animate their rebellious conceits, as that in their letters sent to their fauourers, they daigned their Soueraigne no better stile, then Elizabeth the late Queene, pretended Queene, and no Queene indeede: as likewise did the Countesse of Northumberland in her Letter sent vnto Stuckley, and * others of the faction, in far worse termes.

The Rebels sauciesse towards their Soueraigne. M.S. of Parliament. * The Dutchesse of Ferrara, &c.

They are proclaimed Traitors.

(67) These things diuulged, and their rebellions still going on, Proclamations came forth denouncing them Traitors to their Queene and Countrey; and the Lord Scroope Warden of the West-Marches, with the assistance of the Earle of Cumberland, and other Gentlemen of the Countrey, kept the Castle of Carlile, while Sir Iohn Foster warden of the Middle-Marches, accompanied with Sir Henry Percie, exercised their manlie resistance against these proud Rebelles.

The Earle of Sussex leades against the Rebels.

(68) To withstand their still-growing outrage, Thomas Earle of Sussex (her Maiesties Lieutenant Generall of the North) gathered some forces; whose Lieutenant for the footmen was Edward Earle of Rutland, and for the Horsemen, was Henry Lord Hunsdon, Lord Warden of the East-Marches, William Lord Eure leading the rereward. These followed the enemy to North-Allerton, Croftbridge, Akle, Durham, Newcastle and Hexam, euen close at their heeles; whose power was so weake, and purse so empty, (being defrauded of an hundred thousand Crownes, promised them by the Pope, to maintaine the Rebellion) as that those Rebellious heads entred conference with Edward Dacres at Naworth, of their desperate estate, being both monilesse and powerlesse to withstand the puissance of the Lord Generall, now on their backes, as also the Earles of Warwicke, and Lincolne, the Lords Ferrers, Willowbie, and Howard, approching very neere them, euen at Borrow-briggs. No other succour their consultations could pitch on, then by flight into Scotland, vnto those Lords that there stood out for the Romish.

His Holinesse promiseth treasure to aduance the Rebellion.

The Rebels desperate estate.

The chiefe Rebels flye into Scotland.

(69) So the Night following they put it in practise, not bidding their intrapped traine once farewell, which as Sheepe without a Shepheard, stood gazing at their owne destructions, whilest Sussex surprized them without any resistance. Vpon whose ringleaders, Iustice so seized, that at Durham died, by Marshall Law, an Alderman, a Priest, and sixtie sixe Constables; and in the Country for a great Circuit, a great number of such as were forwardest in the Action.

The remaining ringleaders executed.

(70) Not warned by these successes (which vsually proue vnhappy, in such dissoiall attempts) Leonard Dacres of Harlesey began to gather head againe; whose aiders were the more resolute, in reuenge of their friends executed; and women also became stoute Souldiers in quarrell of their husbands, all forward enough, and too forward to mischief. These vpon a More neere vnto Naworth, to impeach the Lord Hunsdon that made thitherward, had set downe their battell in a triangle forme, where they continued a long and most desperate conflict, but in the end were forced to giue backe, and Dacres to flie from his slaine, wounded, and scattered people, towards Scotland, the then-Refuge of Traiterous transfugers.

(71) Scotland thus harbouring those dissoiall English, and their owne Lords diuided into seuerall factions, some of them sought to conceale, and some to apprehend these guilty Earles; so that Westmorland, was shifted away into Flaunders, but Northumberland, taken by the Regent, and committed to Custody, was afterwards sent into England, where hauing beene attainted by Parliament, vpon the twentie two of August was beheaded at Yorke: vsing liberty of speeches, in auowing the Popes Supremacy, denying subiection vnto his Soueraigne Queene, affirming the Realme to be in a Schisme, and her obedient Subiects no better then Heretickes. Charles Westmorland his consort, a person vtterly wasted by looseneesse of life, euen by Gods iust iudgement, in the time of his Rebellion, was bereaued of children, and afterwards wandring in forraigne parts, had his body eaten with vlcers of lewde causes, as is most constantly reported. But from these temporall proceedings (being the Domesticke effects of a forraign cause) let vs a while behold the spirituall flourish of the Popes leaden Sword, vnsheathed at Rome, to enspirit and enflame such traiterous dispositions against Englands Queene.

Pius the seruant of the seruants of God for remembrance hereof in time to come.

(74) He that raigneth aboue, to whom is giuen all power in Heauen and Earth, hath committed in fulnesse of power to be gouerned, one holy Catholike and Apostolike Church (where-out is no saluation) to one onely in Earth, namely, Peter the Prince of the Apostels, and to the Romane Bishop the Successor of Peter. And him alone hath he made Chiefe ouer all Nations and Kingdomes, who may roote out, destroy, scatter, waste, plant and build: that the faithfull people knit together with the band of mutual Charity, might be kept in the vnity of the Spirit, and presented in health and safety vnto their Sauiour. For the vndergoing of which office we being called by the goodnesse of God to the gouernment of the said Church, doe refuse and omit no paines, labouring by all meanes that this vnity and Catholike Religion (which the Author thereof for the triall of the Faith of those that be his and for our correction and amendment, hath suffered to bee tossed with so great afflictions) might bee preserued whole and entire. But the number of the wicked hath so much increased in power, that now there is no place in the world left, which they haue not attempted to corrupt by most wicked doctrine; among the rest, Elizabeth the seruant of sinfulnesse, the pretensed and vnlawful Queene of England, with whom, as in a Sanctuary the most wicked persons of all doe finde a refuge. This Queene, ruling the Kingdome, and monstrously vsurping to her selfe the place of the Supreme Head of the Church throughout al England, and the chief authority & iurisdiction of the same, hath reuoked againe to miserable ruine this very Kingdome which was in a maner recouered againe to the Catholike faith and good deuotion. For the vse of the true Religion (which the most lawfull Queene, Mary of famous memory by the helpe of this Seate, had repaired, being before by the Apostata, Henry the eight, ouerthrown) now by stronge hand restrained, and the errors of heretickes embraced and followed; shee hath remoued the Councell of State that consisted of the English Nobility, and fild the same with obscure heteticall fellowes; she hath oppressed the Professors of the Catholike faith, and hath set vp wicked Preachers and Ministers of impieties. Shee hath abolished the Sacrifice of the Masse, Praiers, Almes, difference of meate, single life, and Catholike rites. Shee hath commanded bookes to be set foorth containing manifest Heresie, and her selfe vsing and obseruing wicked Rites and Institutions, according to Caluins prescription; hath also commanded them to be obserued by her subiects. Shee hath presumed to cast out, Bishops of Churches, Rectors, and other Catholike Priests, from their Churches and Benefices, and to dispose of them and other Ecclesiasticall liuings among Heretticall men; presuming also to iudge of Church matters; shee hath forbidden the Prelates, the Church and people, that they should not acknowledge the Romane Church, nor that they obey his Precepts and Canonicall Iniunctions; shee hath compelled many to yeeld to her wicked lawes, and to forsweare and abiure the authority and obedience of the Romane Bishop, and to acknowledge her by their Oath the onely Gouernor in temporall and spirituall matters; she hath imposed penalties and punishments vpon those which were not obedient to her command, and hath exacted the like vpon them which perseuered in the vnity of the Faith, and in the aforesaid obedience; she hath cast into prison the Catholike Gouernours and Rectors of Churches, where many, laden with daily languishings and sorrow, haue wofully ended their liues. All which things forasmuch as they are notorious and manifest to all Nations, and so approued by the most graue testimonie of very many, that no way is left them, for excuse, defence, or euasion; We moued by the impieties and mischiefes that more and more multiply, besides the grieuances of the faithfull, the affliction of Religion which groweth daily more intolerable by the meanes and working of the said Elizabeth, whose minde is so hardned and indurate, that shee hath not onely contemned the godly praiers and admonitions of Catholike Princes for her health and conuersion, but also hath not suffered the messengers of this See to come into England to her about this businesse; We, I say, moued by these causes, haue of necessity betaken our selues to the weapons of Iustice against her, not being able to refraine from griefe and sorrow, that wee must needes punish such a one, whose Ancestors haue so well deserued of the Common weale, and of all Christendome. Being therefore strengthned with his authority, who hath pleased to set vs in this supreame Throne of Iustice, though vnfit for so great a burthen, we by the fulnesse of our Apostolike power, doe declare the foresaid Elizabeth an Hereticke, and a maintainer of Heretikes, and those that take her part in the things aforesaid, to haue incurred the sentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from the vnity of Christs body. And moreouer that shee is depriued of the pretenced right of her said Kingdome, and also from all Rule, dignity, and prehemminence whatsoeuer, and also her Nobility, Subiects and People of the said Realme, and all other which haue sworne vnto her, by any manner of meanes are absolued for euer from such Oath, and from all duty of Empire, fidelity and obedience, in such sort as we doe absolue them by the authority of these presents, and depriue the said Elizabeth of the pretenced right of the Kingdome, and of all other things aforesaid. And we doe command and forbid all and singuler of the Nobility, Subiects, People, and other aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her admonitions, commands, nor lawes. Whosoeuer shall doe otherwise, we doe enwrappe them in the like curse. And because it were too difficult a matter to beare these presents to euery place where there is need, we will that the Copies of them being signed with the hand of the publike Notary, and the Ecclesiasticall Prelate, or with the Seale of his Court, haue the same credit and authority in Court, and without it with all Nations euery where, that the presents themselues should haue if they were exhibited. The fruits and effects of the Popes Bull.

(75) The webbe thus wouen by these Spiders of Rome, and the Cockatrices Egge hatched into a Serpent, many were imploied to patch vp this garment of iniquity, and Spirits sent abroad to corrupt Englands sweet aire; the one sort, plotters of inuasions to lay the Land waste, and the other, conspirators against her annointed person. The chief of them both in this place, (omitting the order of Annales) that they may ranke together without interruption of better narrations, & not infect the paper in more places then one, I will heere lay downe; assuring my selfe, that many more attempts were plotted then euer were displaied. For the thunderbolt of curses throwne from that Iupiter of Rome, denouncing her Maiesty vncapable either of Crowne or Kingdome, tooke such rootes in the hearts of these Locusts, that they both armed themselues openly to battel, and secretly sought to imbrue their barbarous hands in their Princes blood.

(76) For this Brutish Bull, calued in the Popes Consistory (or rather Cow-house) and now able to trauell from Rome; in London, and at the West ende of Pauls, first put forth his hornes, being there hung vpon the Bishops Pallace gate, by a lewde person imploied as an Herauld from the Pope. Moreton an old English fugitiue (as hath beene said) had procured it: brazen-faced Sanders in his writings maintaineth it, Bristow in his Motiues approued it, Northumberland & Neuill had put it in practise, Iohn Felton had diuulged it, the two Nortons supported it, and many after-followers assaid to execute it; all which, like Serpents bite the bosomes, wherein themselues lay, but neuer could hurt her, the Lords beloued, and holy Annointed, who in peace & glory came to her graue, and in a full age, as a ricke of Corne into the Barne in due season.

(77) The Marshalists, besides them in the North, were Iohn Throckmorton, Thomas Brooke and George Redman with others, who intended with sound of Trumpet and Drumme, to proclaime their diuellish designe at Harleston Faire in the County of Norfolke; their shew being for the suppression of Strangers, but their maine end, to make a strange alteration in the State; whereby they hastened their owne ends, suffering a death due to Traitors.

(78) But more dangerous were those Conspiratours, which secretly plotted to bring in forraigne powers, or publikely by their writings animated men thereunto, defaming the faire face of Englands Religion, and deforming the body of Elizabeths Gouernment; in which kinde Sanders and Bristow two English fugitiues, were the Iannes and Iambres that withstoode Moses; men of corrupt mindes, and enemies to the Faith; Traitors, heady and high minded, hauing a shew of godlinesse, but denying the power thereof, as the Apostle propheſied, that in the last daies such should arise: both of them approuing Pius Quintus his proceeding about her Maiesties depriuation, and iustifying the wicked in their rebellions, contrarie to the doctrine of that Apostle, whose Chaire they pretend to vphold. From which sinke of iniquity, issued those corrupt streames, that became bitter as wormewood, the taste whereof brought many to their vntimely, but wel-deserued, deathes: among whom, first was Felton, the two Nortons, Kenelme Barne, and Edmund Mather; not long after whom, followed Doctor Story, who may not bee forgotten in our Story.

Iustice executed vpon certaine Traitors.

(79) This man by birth was English, though an Alien in heart, by profession a Ciuilian, and Doctor of the Canon Law, a persecuter of Gods Saints in the daies of the last Queene, and in this Queenes raigne, a turbulent inueigher against the Religion established in the English Church. For which being apprehended and committed to prison, he found means of escape, and in Antwerpe receiued Commission vnder Duke D'Alua, to search all Shippes comming thither, for English bookes; not forgetting his tyranny wherein he had beene trained, nor to further traiterously many and great attempts to bring in forraine powers, for Englands ouerthrow. But the pit that he digged, he fell into himselfe, and the destruction prepared for others, light on his owne pate; for one Parker, an English Marchant, loially affected to his Prince, trading to Antwerpe, laid his snare faire to catch this foule birde; causing secret notice to bee giuen vnto Story, that in his Ship were store of Hereticall books, with other intelligences, which might stand him in steede.

Cocke-sure, hasted to execute his Commission himselfe, where with lookes very bigge vpon the poore Mariners, each Cabbin, Chest and Corner, aboue borde were searched, & some things found to draw him further on; so that the hatches must bee opened, which seemed to bee vnwillingly done, and great signes of feare was shewed by their faces. This drew on the Doctor to descend into the hould; where now in the trap, the mouse might well gnawe, but could not get out; for the hatches went downe, and the sailes hoised vp, which with a merrie gale were blowne into England, where ere long hee was arraigned and condemned of high Treason, and accordingly was executed at Tiborne, as he had well deserued.

(81) To the like end came Sherwin, Campion, Kirby, with others seditious trumpetters of this infamous Bull, and Sanders the Irish Legate, and greatest maintainer of his goring authority, though hee escaped the Barre of iustice, yet was found out by a rauing Phrensie, as he wandred succourlesse in the waste mountaines of Ireland, wherein lastly he miserably died. But to leaue these poisonous tonguemen and libellous pen-men to register their owne shame, and seare their consciences with the brand of sinne; let vs discouer those other daring and swording Monsters, who actually imploied themselues, to lay, either violent hands vpon her Maiesties person, or the Land open to forreine invasions.

(82) The first of them (or first manifested) was Iohn Somervile of Elstowe in Warwickeshire, a furious young man, who like a tempest that threatned destruction, came ragingly forward towards the Court, with intent to murther the Queene; the progresse of which attempt summarily was thus. Keeping his Whitsontid with Arden (his wiues father) he was there so wrought by Hall a Seminary Priest, as hee conceiued a desperate rage against her Maiesty, holding it a matter (seeing there was no hope of alteration during the life of the Queene) meritorious to make her away; to which bloody resolution, he was further instigated by his wicked wife. Whereupon returning home, hee grew much perplexed, hauing many feares and conflicts in himselfe, which caused his wife to write vnto Hall, to come and strengthen the man with firmer resolutions. But he, busied elsewhere with the like purposes, by letter excused his not comming, yet therein aduised him to goe forward, promising he would assist him with his praiers to God for his good successe.

(83) This letter receiued, hee grew fully resolued to actuate the designe, and hasted his iourney amayne towards London; who no sooner departed, but that his wife sent Halles letter vnto her mother, and shee presently made it knowne to Arden her husband, which letter hee caused to bee burnt as soone as himselfe was called in question. But Somervile discouered by the way, was indited in Warwicke, and those his Associates condemned of high Treason in London; Somervile confessing his intent said, that hee had beene moued thereunto by his wicked spirit, and by the inticements of certain seditious persons, his Kinsmen and Allies, together with the often reading of pernicious bookes, published against her Maiesty. This desperate Ruffian committed to Newgate after his condemnation, most desperately strangled himselfe to death; an example of Gods seuerity against such sonnes of disobedience.

(84) Of which litter in the dayes of this blessed Deborah, not so few as one hundred and twenty of knowne Iesuites and Seminaries scrawled like frogs, through her faire soile, croaking, and spawning their doctrine to recall obedience to the Pope, and disswading the Subiects from the allegiance vnto their Queene: Of this number fifty three with pardon of life were banished the land, and the rest as Traitors died for conspiracy against her person, and breach of the law in that case enacted for the indemnity of the State. To shrowde themselues and their Disciples from that daunger of law, at the suite of Campion, Persons, Haywood, and Hart, a dispensation was giuen to the Camelion Catholikes, from the rigororus extent of the foresaid Bull: so that most of these Seminaries imploied for England, cast off their Serpentine Skinner, and shewed themselues abroad in the attire of Gallants, the more safely to vent their enuenomed drugges, and to keepe their Coules from preaching at the Gallowes.

The Romanists suite to the Pope

Let there be desired of our most high Lord an explication or meaning of the Bull declaratory, made by Pius the fifth against Elizabeth, and such as do adhere or obey her: Which Bull the Catholikes desire to bee vnderstood in this manner, that the same Bull shall alwayes bind her and the Heretikes, but the Catholikes it shall by no meanes bind, as matters doe now stand or be, till hereafter, when the publike execution of that Bull may bee had or made. And in the Conclusion thus, The highest Pontiffe granted these foresaid Graces to Father Robert Persons, and Edmund Campion, who are now to take their way into England the fourteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of our Lord 1580. being present, the Father Oliuerius, Manarke assistant. And though the one of these Spiders sponne his Webbe so in corners, as hee could not be found, yet was the other swept downe by the hand of Iustice, and drew his last threed in the Triangle of Tyborne. After whom others, as some likewise before them, ploughing with the same Heifer, and sowing the furrowes with the same seed, reaped their harueft with no better increase then tares or darnell could yeeld, as was seene by their successes.

(86) Wherein Cuthert Mayne in Cornwall had (before this time) borne a part, who armed with an Agnus Dei, and an old Copie for a new Iubile, with some other Writings, maintaining the authority of Rome, disswaded the naturall subiects from their due obedience, deliuering diuers holy Graines (as he tearmed them) by which, hee that had such should bee knowne to bee sure of that side, and thereby to bee defended in the bloody day, as by his inditement stādeth vpon Record, and cōfessed vnder his own hand.

For trauelling into forraine parts, and there obtaining the title of a Ciuilian Doctor, he fell from his naturall alleagiance (as riotous Malecontents vſually doe) and reconciled himſelfe vnto the See of Rome, then hauing frequent acquaintance and conference with certaine Ieſuiticall Prieſts, was finally inſpired with a helliſh reſolution to kill her who had giuen him life.

For hauing priuate acceſſe to her preſence, was heard at large, that hee was the man who had vndertaken her death, which to ſound the deepe waters, and to beare ſaile with the faireſt hee promiſed to doe, with no intent, as hee conſtantly affirmed, to act that impoſed charge, but onely to diſcouer thoſe who laid for her life. Her Highneſſe (whoſe piercing vnderſtanding was not eaſily blinded or beguiled with words) ſeemed ſo doubtfully to interpret his confeſſed fact (which yet ſhee kept ſecret from her neereſt Counſellers) that he in great feare departed; as how can a conſcience ſo clogged but feare? Whereupon his late letter from Como hee ſhewed; which ſeeming alſo to bee little eſteemed, and his ſuit to be Mr. of St. Katherines, vtterly reiected, confirmed more deſperatly his reſolution to kil her: and often hauing weapon, preſence, place & oportunity, purpoſely thought to performe it, but euer was daunted when he beheld the glory of her preſence, and Maieſty in her face, wherein to his ſeeming the Image of God, in her his Vice-gerent, was portraied, commanding him obedience, and threatning deſtruction to thoſe who intend violence againſt his holy annointed.

My case is rare, and strange, and for any thing I can remember singular: a naturall Subiect solemnly to vewe the death of his naturall Queene, (so borne, so knowne, and so taken by all men) for the reliefe of the afflicted Catholike, and restitution of Religion. The matter first conceiued in Venice, the seruice (in general words) presented to the Pope, continued and vndertaken in Paris, and lastly, commended and warranted by his holines digested and resolued in England, if it had not beene preuented by accusation, or by her Maisties greater lenity and more gratious vsage of her Catholike Subiects. This is my first and last offence conceiued against my Prince, or Countrey, and doth (I cannot deny) containe all other faults whatsoeuer. It is now to bee punished by death, or most graciously (beyond all common expectation) to be pardoned. Death I doe confesse to haue deserued: life I doe (with all humilite) craue, if it may stand with the Queens Honour, and policie of the time. To leane so great a Treason vnpunished, were strange; to drawe it by my death, in example, were dangerous. A sworne seruant to take vpon him such an enterprize, vpon such a ground and by such a warrant, hath not beene seene in England. To indite him, arraigne him, bring him to the Saffold, and to publish his offence, can doe no good. To hope that hee hath more to discouer then is confessed, or that at his execution he will vnsay any thing he hath written, is in vaine. To conclude, that it is impossible for him in time to make some part of amends, were very hard and against former experiences. The question then is, whether it be better to kill him, or (lest the matter be mistaken) vpon hope of his amendment to pardon him. For mine owne opinion (though partiall) I will deliuer you my conscience. The case is good* Queene Elizabeths; the offence is committed against her sacred person; and shee may (of her mercy) pardon it without preiudice to any. Then this I say, in few words, as a man more desirous to discharge his troubled conscience, then to liue. Pardon poore Parrie, and releeue him: for life without liuing is not fit for him. If this may not be, or be thought dangerous or dishonourable to the Queenes Maiesty (as by your fauours I thinke it full of honour and mercy) then I beseech your Lordships (and no other) once to heare me before I be endicted, and afterwards, if I must die, humbly to entreat the Queenes Maiesty to hasten my triall and execution: which I pray God, with all my heart, may proone as honourable to her, as I hope, it shall bee happy to me. Who will, while I liue (as I haue done alwaies) pray to Iesus Christ for her Maisties long and prosperous raigne. From the Tower the 18. of February. 1584.

Which accordingly was executed in the Palace at Westminster, vpon the second of March following; where (whether for feare of preiudicing and discrediting the Romanists cause, or by whatsoeuer other perswasion) he impudently denied, that he euer had an intent to kill the Queene, notwithstanding all his owne former confessions, witnesse of the fact, and other cleare euidences of truth; amongst which, the letter receiued from Cardinall Como is not vnworthy to be here annexed, whose translation from the originall, written in the Italian tongue, is as followeth.

(101) Sir, his Holinesse hath seene your letter of the first, with the assurance included, and cannot but commend the good disposition and resolution, which you write to bould towards the seruice and benefit publike: wherein his Holinesse doth exhort you to perseuere, with causing to bee brought to effect that which you promise. And to the end you may be so much the more holpen by that good spirit which hath moued you thereunto, his holinesse doth grant you plenary indulgence, and remission of all your sinnes, according to your request. Assuring you that besides the merite that you shall receiue therefore in heauen, his Holinesse will further make himselfe debtor to acknowledge and requite your deseruings, by all the best meanes he may. And that so much the more in that you vse the more modesty in not pretending any thing. Put therefore to effect your holy and honorable determinations, and attend your health. And to conclude, I offer my selfe vnto you hartily, and wish all good and happy successe. From Rome, the xxx. of Ianuary, 1584.

(102) Had not then her Maiesty iust cause to complaine, as shee did? when in the honourable assembly of Parliament, she openly professed, that shee knew no creature breathing, whose life stood hourely in more perill then her owne; and that euen at the first entrance into her estate, she entred into infinite dangers of life, as one that had to wrestle with many and mighty enemies. And yet, in confidence of her celestiall Protector, and of her owne innocency, shee often seemed somewhat too remisse and neglectiue in the care of her selfe and life as appeared manifestlie by her proceedings with this last Traitor, in keeping his conference of that importance, from the knowledge of her Counsellers, and often admitting priuately his accesse, though he had tolde her, he was the man appointed to worke her death. And indeed such was this Princesse Magnanimity, that in an apparant danger, as great, though not so traiterous as this, she shewed a resolution of courage farre aboue her sexe; when being in her Barge vpon Thames to take the aire, accompanied with the French Ambassador, the Earle of Lincolne, and others, a Seruingman in the Court with his Caliuer discharged a Bullet, and shot the Waterman, within sixe foote of her seate, (the second to her Bales) through both the armes; whereat all other being amazed, and the man abundantly bleeding, she threw him her scarffe, and with words of comfort bad him be of good cheere, he should not want, for the bullet was aimed at her, though it hit him; and with such resolute courage bare it out, as all present, admired. Neither so onely, but knowing afterwards that it was done casually at randome, she both pardoned the partie of his life, when he was to die, and commanded his Master to retaine him againe into his seruice.

(103) And indeed, of so singular clemency, and inbread lenity was this Lady, that shee neuer heard mention of the capitall (though neuer so deserued) punishment of offenders, euen of such as had sought her owne death, but it bred a kinde of horror and sorrow in her; whereby, had not her Counsellers earnestly inculcated the necessity of such exemplary Iustice, many dangerous attempters had escaped their

Which moued her to say, being once questioning with a * great Diuine of Oxford, about bookes meetest for Princes to study on, that her Reading of Seneca de Clementia, had done her much good, but some would perswade her, it had done her State as much harme. But for her loue to her people in generall, and tender care ouer the poorer sort, or any waies oppressed, it was incomparable; whose cares were not only open at all times to their complaints, and her hands ready to receiue their petitions; but her manner was also to commend their cause vnto her Counsell and Iudges, giuing these and the like earnest charges; Haue care of my people, you haue my place: do you to them that which I ought to do; they are my people, yet euery man oppresseth and spoileth them without mercy. Themselues can neither helpe themselues nor reuenge their quarrell: See vnto them, I pray you, see vnto them, for they are my charge, them therefore I charge you with, euen as God hath committed them vnto me. I care not for my selfe, my life is not deare vnto mee, my care is for my people; I pray God my Successor bee as carefull for them; and surely they which might know my cares for my people, may likewise conceiue, that I take no great ioy in wearing the Crowne.

(104) What heart then could conceiue so great mischiefe, or hand could bee so barbarously violent, as to worke the destruction of so louing a nursing Mother, but onely those obdurate and venemous Vipers, which eat forth the way from the wombe of their owne conceptions? Or rather those sting-tailed Locusts, arising with foggy smoake from the bottomlesse pit, who to reare vp their Dagon or great King Abaddon, cast downe Princes with the wings of their warre, and execute their damnable doctrine in the murthers of the Lords annointed; whereas Dauid durst not touch Saul, though he was abiected by God.

Apoc. 9.2.

(105) Those Proselites so vncessantly, yeere by yeere, prosecuted the Romane cause, that many of them thereby deseruedly came to their deaths; amongst whom was Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland, gone so farre in such disloiall enterprizes, as being vpon suspition of Treason committed to the Tower of London, he laid violent hands vpō his own life, by discharging a Dagge, charged with three bullets, vnder his left pappe, wherewith he pierced his heart, and presently dying, was by a Iurie found guilty of his owne death. The Treason laid against him (besides the former of the insurrection in the North, by himselfe confessed, and by the Court fined at fiue thousand Markes) was, that he had been priuy to the Plots of Throgmorton, for the bringing in of Forreine powers, to the destruction of the Queen and Realme; which truth being reuealed by other conspirators, he so deepely apprehended, as in that desperate manner hee preuented his further iudgement.

(107) Neither were these great ones drawne alone into the confederacie of Romes irreligious purposes, but others also, thirsting for Englands destruction, of lesse quality or place, had parts appointed to be actors in the Scene: which parties themselues shal now enter the Stage, euen foureteene in number; whereof Anthony Babington Esquire, was the principall, the others were Chidiock Tichborne, Charles Tilney, Edward Abington, Thomas Salisbury, and Edward Iones Esquires, Iohn Sauage, Robert Barnewell, Henrie Dun, Iohn Trauerse, Iohn Charnocke, and Richard Gage, Gentlemen, and Iohn Ballard a Seminarie Priest; for can there be any conspiracies hatched without them? The plot was the more dangerous, by how much the more secretly carried, and the parties resolute to venture therein vnto death, whereof sixe vndertooke to murther the Queene, and Sauage bound himselfe for her death.

Babingtons lewes.

(108) The shew must be against the precise Puritanes, whose chiefe or * head in the Low Countrey, not onely threatned (as was pretended) the destruction of all Romish Catholikes, but also to vsurpe the Crowne from the Queene; and therefore for the security of both, they were thus enforced to make ready for armes. Their aiders in England were many, as Babington beleeued, who wrote that the West parts, the North parts, all Wales, the Counties of Lancaster, Darby, and Stafford, were in great forwardnesse, and had giuen fidelity to giue aide to the enterprize. That Lord Percy could doe much in the North, Arundel in the South, and the Lord Paget in the heart of the Land, though two of them were then in Prison, and Paget in Spaine; their onely want was of a Nobleman to leade them, whereof they were destitute, as Babington complained, vnlesse it were Westmorland, and he out of the Realme.

The false imaginations which Traitors haue of Abettors and friends.

(109) Their forreine assisters were many and strong, especially Spaine, as Mendoza assured them. The Ports were appointed where the Inuaders should land; and once landed, should be seconded from al parts by the Italianated English, as they vainly hoped; the Statists surprized which held not for Rome; the faith restored that had beene abandoned; and the vsurping Competitor (for so they termed the true annointed Soueraigne) dispatched by murthers; themselues the onely men marked (if euer) now to redeeme the Land, from the seruitude and bondage, which Heresie had brought, with the losse of thousands of Soules. These were their glozes vpon Pius Quintus his alleaged Text, and the faire visards that hid their foule faces; whom God himselfe vnmasked to their following shame.

(110) For Ballard being sent to Mendoza, to signifie all things now in a readinesse, and ready to embarke himselfe for France, was suddenly apprehended; and part of the conspiracy discouered. Whereupon Babington, with Charnock and Sauage, enters a new resolution, which was immediately to kill the Queene, whereas of their bounty it had beene ordered before, that shee should liue vntill the Inuasion, which was appointed to bee in September following. But being intercepted before he well wist, he was committed to Custody, yet so as hee went abroad with his Keeper, from whom he shortly made his escape: and thinking to recouer the Seas, disguised himselfe like a Labouring man, staining with wall-nut-tree leaues his hands and face, which shadowed neither his shame nor sinne, neither yet could hide him from the eye that called him to account; for being descried and brought backe to London, he was with curses of the people committed to the Tower, whence he could not so easily start.

(111) The other conspirators, hearing of these their confederates successe, dispersed themselues and plaied least in sight, yet were they found out, indited and brought to their tryals, all of them confessing their treasons without any torture. Yet at their arraignement (perswading themselues belike, that what they did by papall warrant, could not be called Treason,) they pleaded not guilty, which the Iury vpon manifest proofes finding otherwise, they worthily receiued iudgement of death, and died accordingly in Lincolnes Inne fields, euen in the place where they had often conferred for the execution of their Treasons.

The Traitors executed.

(112) The nest of conspirators thus broken in England, and their snares still failing though neuer so craftily laid, was a sore corsiue to the English fugitiues tiues in other forreigne parts; especially to the Iesuits, whose griefes were as great, as in the paine of a Scorpion when he hath stunge a man. Among whom Iaques Frances a perfidious Traitor, and base Laundresse sonne, seeing the Catholicks thus cast downe and their case desperate, if treasons were thus preuented and punished, pronounced this maxime out of his vnwashed mouth, that the State of England then was, and would be so setled, as vnlesse Mistris Elizabeth (for so he termed his dread Soueraigne) were suddenly taken away, all the Diuels in Hell would not be able to preuaile against, or shake it. And Stanley that transfugous Champion for Spaine and Rome, so impatient was of these vnprospered proceedings, that he hired Patrick Cullen, an Irish Fencer and Ruffian, to vndertake the death of the Queene; which he did for the summe of thirty pounds, but had no more for his money then the report of a Traitors death, which deseruedly hee suffered at Tyburne.

(113) To accompany and second these treasons of Cullen, Cresswell the Legier Iesuite in Spaine, writ his traiterous booke vnder the name of Philopater, as after him Cowback alias Parsons, another Iesuite, and Rector at Rome, did the like, vnder the name of Doleman, concerning titles of the Crowne, both so full of falshood, treason, and impudency, as, (though the Authors be vnnamed,) whosoeuer looketh on the brats, will easily know their Fathers by the resemblance.

(114) This desperate designe failing, another as diuelish was assaid to bee practized, wherein, no English man was yet knowne to haue had any hand, the Actors being onely Spaniards and Portugals, the one solliciting by promises of great rewards, the other vndertaking to worke the death of the Queene; which was contriued, that poison should be giuen her in Physicke, a designe indeed most fezible and inuitable, had not that hellish hand beene staid by a heauenly. Rodericke Lopez was the Physitian, a Doctor of that profession and a Portugall by birth, in especiall trust and practise for the state of her health.

(115) Hee a fit instrument to act without suspect, receiued for an earnest, a Iewell of gold, of good valew, garnished with a great Diamond, and a large Rubie, from Christophero de Moro, a speciall Counsellor of the King of Spaine, whose lustre so dazelled his eies, as the practise of treason possessed his heart, and vpon farther payment of fifty thousand Crownes, hee couenanted to take away her Maiesties life, in a potion giuen her vpon pretence of health. For the assurance of which money, Manuel Andrada, the bringer of the Iewel, conferred with the Conde de Fuentes at Callis, and Stephano Ferrera, a Portugall also, delt likewise by letters with Stephano Ibarra the Kings Secretary at Bruxels, to make the same readie: Lopez himselfe assuring them the deed should bee done, when the money was paid, which daily was promised and daily expected; the onely stay pretended was, that King Philip did not well like, that so base a person as Andrada was, should be emploied in so waighty a cause.

(116) Whereupon Ferrara of better repute with the King, receiued bils of exchange for the money, deliuered by the Counte Fuentes, and from the said Counte, Manuell Lewis another Portugall, was presently sent into England to conferre with Ferrara, and they both with Lopez, who faithfully promised vpon the payment of the money to performe the villanie. At which very instant Gods mercy did bring to light the conspiracy, through the continuall vigilancy of some Lords of the Counsell, in which number neuer any Prince had more, Sapient, Sedulous, Prouident, and experienced Sages, then Shee had.

(117) And to make experiment of his intendments, Lopez was appointed to giue the Queen Physicke; who made ready the potion, and brought it to her presence. But her Maiesty knowing what hee least suspected, told him, hee must goe minister to the Lord Treasurer, Cecill, who at that present had more need of Physicke then her selfe; whereupon Lopez with double diligence repaired vnto him, signifying his comming was to minister his Lordship Physicke, so commanded him by the Queene: yea marry said the old man but what is your Physicke? a purge and it please your honor said Lopez: a purge Master Doctor said the Lord Treasurer, I thinke I must become a Physitian to purge you, and thereupon he apprehended him for a Traitor, who stood so perplexed with feare, that his presence was scarce tollerable for the smell. Then other Doctors of Physicke were called, for to examine the ingredients, who easily found that the potion was poison, for which hee was indicted and arraigned at Barre, where he pleaded not guilty, and his two Consorts by long circumstances sought to saue their liues, yet their former confessions subscribed with their owne hands, gaue sufficient testimony of their guilts, for which at Tyburne vpon the seauenth of Iune they suffered death.

(118) Stephano Ibarra thus failing of his purpose, by these Portugal fals, sought yet to raise the fabricke of his wicked intents, vpon the resolutions of some English fugitiues; among whom none were held more fit then Edmund Yorke, and Richard Williams, souldiers by profession, and two desperate Champions for the quarrell of Rome; vnto whom Hugh Owen an English Rebell, and Spanish Pensioner, shewed an assignation, vnder that Secretaries hand, of foure thousand Crownes to bee giuen them for to murder their Queene, and for assurance that the same should be forth comming, the assignation was deliuered in Deposito, to Holt an English Iesuite, who producing the Sacrament and kissing it, tooke solemne Oath to pay the money assoone as the fact was done.

(119) To forward this enterprize, three seuerall consultations were held at Bruxels, wherein Holt sate as President, and William Stanley Proctor for this diuelish designe, animating Yorke by his vncles example, to be constantly resolued, as a man ordained for his Countries good, and though many had miscarried in attempting the Act, yet that it was meritorious and easie to be done. Thomas Throgmorton, Michaell Moodie, Charles Paget, Henry Owen, Edmund Garret, and the two diuine Doctors, Gifford and Worthington, were principall speakers in this impious Parliament; all of them eager to egge on the two vndertakers, and to ioyne to them a third man, named Young, whose taske should be to kill the greatest Counsellors, as soone as the Queene should be dead. The last that spake was Holt the President, who after he had ministred these Traitors their Oathes, in threatning wise, menaced to take from the English this high and acceptable seruice, and to employ therein Strangers, who were farre more worthy: and so sent the two former into England with his blessing, which neuertheless could not saue them from the Gallowes: their purposes were to get entertainement of some great Courtier, the better to effect what they intended, and to seeme men of some note for intelligence, sent from Callis to procure their pasport, but the vigilant eye of the English state had found out their treasons before; & bringing them afterwards to their trials, they were foūd gilty, iudged, & died like traitors.

(120) The last publike attempter, that assaid the Queenes death, was Edward Squire, a Scriuener of Greenewich, who by deputation had emploiment of a Purueyer in the Stable, but being in witte aboue his vocation, and carrying his sailes aboue his fortunes, put himselfe in action for Sea in the last voiage of Sir Francis Drake made into the Indies. Embarked he was in a small shippe, called the Frances, who loosing the Fleete about Guadalupe, was taken by fiue Spanish Frigots, and with other brought Prisoners into Spaine: where falling in acquaintance with Richard Walpoole an English fugitiue by order a Iesuite, in great credit, and vicar Generall to Parsons, in Squier a fit ſubiect to worke vpon.

(121) Vpon him Walpoole therefore meant to worke, conceiuing for his purpoſe two ſpeciall aduantages: the one, that comming into Spaine a Priſoner, and not a fugitiue, his returne into England would be without ſuſpect, the other, that Squire had beene emploied in the Queenes Stable, and therefore had liberty of free acceſſe: But the more to inuolue what hee intended, hee ſubtilly cauſed Squier to be apprehended by the Inquiſition, and put priſoner into the holy Houſe: where mollified by diſtreſſe, hee got his heart into his hands, ſo that of a Neuter he became a fixed Romaniſt.

(122) This firſt aſſay prouing effectuall, for an introduction to his further intendments, he fell into the old ſong; whoſe burden was the tyrannies vſed, and the perſecutions exerciſed in England againſt the poore Catholikes; vpon how few perſons the Engliſh State did ſtand, and how eaſily thoſe props were to be remooued, if any denoted would put to their hands. Squire who wanted no wit to perceiue whereat he aymed; firſt, gaue ſome ſlight ſignification, and after a more ſerious proteſtation, that hee was the man, that would ſacrifice himſelfe and his ſeruice in the cauſe.

Walpoole proiects the killing of the Earle of Eſſex.

(123) The good Father hauing thus got him into the circle, began then the charme: It were (ſaid he) no doubt a worke meritorious to kill the Earle of Eſſex; but vnum neceſſarium, one thing is neceſſary: And then tould him plainely, that he meant to put a ſeruice vpon him of great worth, and reward; which he might accompliſh without any euident perill of life, becauſe it was to bee done not immediately vpon her perſon, nor in her preſence, neither yet in doing it (though hee were ſeene) ſhould be endangered, being acted as hee would preſcribe; and that was, to impoyſon the pommell of the Queenes ſaddle, at ſuch time as ſhee ſhould ride abroade, the Pommell being the place, whereon ſhee would reſt her hand, and her hand not vnlikely to touch her mouth or noſtrils, would giue acceſſe to the forcible poiſon. This, ſaid he, might eaſily be performed, he hauing familiar acquaintance in the Quirry, yea and that very ſafely; but if otherwiſe, and immediate death happened, he ſhould be aſſured, that for the exchange of this preſent and tranſitory life, to enioye the ſtate of a Glorious Sainct in Heauen.

Walpoules heauenly conſolations.

(124) Which Syrens ſong ended, and Squire inueigled; confeſſions, vowes, promiſes, receite of the Sacrament, and all, confirmed the reſolution of the diueliſh attempt; and to preuent varying from this Center, Walpoole tould him, that now he ſtood in the ſtate of damnation, if hee did not his vttermoſt endeuour to performe his vow, bidding him remember, how that the ſinne of backſlyding did ſeldome obtaine pardon; and if he did but once make doubt of the lawfulneſſe or merit of the act, it was enough to caſt him head-long downe into hell; and if he did conceiue any difficulties, he wiſhed him to conſider what it auailed a man, to win the whole world, and to looſe his owne ſoule.

His ghoſtly Counſels.

(125) Squier thus armed (though not with that complete Armour of the Apoſtle) fell downe in confeſſion before this Ieſuites feete; whom he lifted vp, hugd him about the necke, with his left arme (ſuch were Squires owne words) and croſſing him with his other hand, mumbled a few words in Latine, and then diſtinctly in Engliſh ſpake thus; God bleſſe thee, and giue thee ſtrength my ſonne; bee of good courage, I pawne my ſoule for thine, and thou ſhalt haue my praiers dead and aliue. Thereupon deliuering vnto him the poyſon, directed how it ſhould be vſed, and ſhewed him the nature of the confection; which was, to bee put into a double bladder, and when it was to bee employed, to be pricked full of holes, and ſo preſſed out vpon the pommell of the Queenes ſaddle; the operation whereof was ſuch, that vpon his hand hee muſt haue a thicke double gloue, leaſt the poyſon thereof ſhould infect himſelf; whoſe vigour alſo was ſuch, as neither continuance of time, nor ſubtilty of ayre could checke or vn-vertuate the ſtrength: And that the matter might be carried without all ſuſpect, an exchange was accepted of two Spaniſh priſoners in England, for Rowles and Squire, to be releaſed from Spaine.

Occaſion being giuen by the Queenes riding abroad, and her Horſe made ready and attending in the Stable-yard, thether Squier repaired, full of euill ſpirits; and laying his hand vpon the pommel of her Saddle, bruiſed out the poyſon in the bladder, ſaying cheerefully, God ſaue the Queen; with no better affection then Ioab bare to Amaſa, when with his hand he tooke him to kiſſe him, but with his ſword ſtrock him to the heart. * In Iuly.

Act. 28. 5.

(127) The deed thus done, without all miſtruſt, Squier taking the remaine of the poyſon, within ſixe daies after departed to the Sea, and had his entertainment in the Earle of Eſſex his owne Ship, where ſeeking to finiſh his diueliſh deſigne betwixt Faial and Saint Michaels beſtowed his confection, vpon the pommels of a wodden chaire, wherein the Earle vſually ſate at meales: which in like manner (the Lord ſo working) tooke not effect, to the no little admiration of Squier, though very well ſatisfied, that the default was not his, but rather in the poyſon it ſelfe; and his vow now diſcharged (as he thought) he ſlept the more quiet.

Squiers endeuour to poyſon the Earle of Eſſex going to Cadiz.

(128) Walpoole the Ieſuite ouer-tickled with ioye of his hoped ſucceſſe, and not able longer to keepe ſecrecy, imparted his treaſons to his companions in Spaine, who together with him daily expected the iſſue thereof, but all things ſilent, and no newes of the Cataſtrophe, they chaunged their opinions, and held Squire for a falſ-brother, when as alſo their longing hearts beganne to feare, leaſt the maine cauſe would bee mard, being caſt into ſo bad a mould. Whereupon a conſultation was called, and the Sicophant condemned in the higheſt degree, whoſe end muſt be ſpeedily wrought, or elſe thoſe Catholike proceedings would ſurely come to wracke; for that he knowing much, would (as was feared) reueale much more; and therefore it was politikely concluded, that one ſhould be let ſlip from them into England, to giue information of Squires treaſons.

Squiers Treaſon ſucceſſeles.

Squire miſtruſted to be a falſe brother.

(129) This man to haue the more credit brought two letters in his budget, the one he affirmed, himſelf had ſtolne out of a Ieſuits ſtudy, & the other brought from another perſon, both which indeed were found to be counterfeit, and Squire for the preſent reputed an honeſt man. Yet becauſe the matter was tender, and touched nere the quicke, Squire was ſent for, and examined; at firſt he denies all, but comming to circumſtances, ſomething was found, hould taken, and the Traitor committed to Priſon; who left alone, began to bethinke him how farre his Confeſſors Confeſſion might extend, and therefore by good Counſell (the truth withall working) therein

A counterfeit meſſenger ſent from the Ieſuits.

Squire voluntarily confeſſeth his treaſon.

he discloſed the Treaſon, and how farre he had therein gon, which indeed no man had knowledge of but himſelfe, and this confeſſed at the Tower, without torture, and at the Barre with remorſe of conſcience, he had his ſentence of death, which he accordingly ſuffered.

The laſt motiue to the ſtate to make ſharp Laws to prevent Treaſons.

(130) Had not then the wiſe Statiſts of the Land, cauſe to enact ſuch Lawes as they did; to ſet the ſhaking ſword in the entrance of this faire Eden, and to ſtoppe out the wilde Bore that would lay the vineyard waſt? their Queene and lamp of Glory, hauing thus often and narrowly eſcaped extinguiſhing, by as many hands of murthering Prieſts and Ieſuites, as Dauid had purſuers of his life, when to Ionathan hee complained that there was but a ſteppe betwixt him and death? So that iuſtly in a conference of Parliament, for meanes to be had againſt the many conſpirators, daily leuelling at her royall heart, one of good repute, hauing experience of their deſperate deſignes, in the open aſſembly, with a feeling affection, thus vttered his minde: that euery night when hee awaked, hee feared to heare ſome newes of deſperate miſchiefe, and proteſted before God, hee neuer ſaw the light of the day, but that he feared, before the Sun-ſet, to heare of ſome ſtrange attempt.

1. Sam. 20. 3.

So many and ſo continually were the conſpiracies.

(131) For as the Pope had denounced vnder his Buls, an abſolutiõ to him that wold dethroan Elizabeth Englands faire Queen ſo were there many foule minded Proſelites, that reputed her bloud as an acceptable ſacrifice, which many times they ſought to offer vnto their God: but hers and our God, the Watchman of Iſrael, neither ſlumbred nor ſleepes in protecting her Perſon as the apple of his eye, whoſe iuſt defence, her innocency, and their bloudy guilts, haue often diuulged to the whole world; neuer any Prince eſcaping ſo many dangers, as this moſt milde and mayden Queene in her daies had done, and many more no doubt were put in practice, which lay groueling in darkeneſſe, and neuer came to light, and as the workes of darkeneſſe, ſo let them lie, and let vs haſten to our former, and farre more pleaſing Subiect. Hauing therefore from the yeere 1570. made our digreſſion, for the cloſer relation of all thoſe treacheries together; let vs thence purſue the enſuing occurrents of her raigne and life.

Many more conſpiracies then euer came to light.

The affaires of Scotland.

(132) The troubles of Scotland were about that time, great and many, and much the more by the death of the new Regent, who was ſlaine by the hand of Treaſon, with the ſhot of an Harquebuſſe, as he rode through Lithquo, miſtruſting no danger, at which time a Roade was made into England, by ſuch as little regarded the peace. Whereupon Suſſex the Earle Generall, accompanied with the Lord Hunſdon, Gouernour of Barwicke, in Hoſtile manner entered that kingdome; and in Tiuidale did much hurt to the Inhabitants.

(133) New troubles then ariſing for the death of the Regent, and the Land full of factions, threatning ciuill broiles, the Engliſh Queenes aide was ſent for, by ſome of the Lords, who with their helps, preuailed in winning and demoliſhing many ſtrong and faire Caſtles. And the Earle of Lennox ſent into Scotland by her Maieſty, was firſt made Lord Gouernor, and after L. Regent, by the election of their three eſtates, who afterwards was as trayterouſly murthered, as the other before him had beene, which cauſed great troubles in Scotland; yea and ſome Nobles of England were not exempted from the ſame.

(134) For Lord Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolke, intending ſome fauours for the Scottiſh cauſe, proceeded ſo farre therein, as the letter of the Law took aduantage of his life, to the great ſorrow and laments of very many. For being a man filled with fauour, both of his Prince, and of the People, fortune at length made him a Ball for her banding; who firſt from Burnam beſides Windſore was brought to Weſtminſter, and thence by water was left priſoner in the Tower, where he remained from the eleuenth of October, vnto the fourth of Auguſt following, and then was remoued to the Charter-Houſe neere Smithfield, where he abode thirteene moneths ſpace; till laſtly he was ſent backe againe into the Tower, where vpon the hill and Ordinary Scaffold, he penitently ſuffered death; being the firſt vnfortunate Engliſh Noble that for offence loſt life ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne.

(135) About which time, a ſtrange caſe (which we will inſert, rather to ſhew the courſe of Iuſtice and mercy of the Queene, then for any other great vſe in Story) happened at the Common-law barre: where Simon Lowe, and Iohn Kyme were Plaintifes, for a certaine Manor and demaines in the Iſle of Harty, adioyning to that of Sheppey in Kent, wrongfully poſſeſt (as they alleaged) by Thomas Paramour, againſt whom they brought a writ of right: the defendant offered to maintaine his title by Combat, which the Plaintifes accepted, and brought their Champions before the Iudges to the Barre. For Paramour was George Thorne, of a bigge and broad ſet, who caſt downe his Gantlet as Challenger, to iuſtifie Paramours right, which was taken vp by Henry Nailor Maſter of defence, a man proper and ſlender, and not very tall, who appeared for Lowe and Kyme, to make good their claime.

Duell or combat for title of Lands.

The two Champions.

(136) The place appointed for Combat was in Tuttle-fields, where a plot of ground of one and twenty yards ſquare, was doubly rayled, and without the Weſt-ſquare a ſtage ſet for the Iudges, repreſenting the Court of Common Pleas, behind the which two Tents were pitched, the one for Thorne, and the other for Nailor, the field with Scaffolds on euery ſide for people to ſee: All things thus ready and the day drawing on, her Maieſty, (who euer abhorred all bloodſhead,) tooke the matter into her owne hands, and gaue command and directions for the parties agrement, with a ſurceaſe from all further ſuite, which could not well be, vnleſſe the Champions appeared in field; who altogether ignorant of what was determined, vpon the day aſſigned appeared in place. Thorne was there firſt who was brought to his Tent by Sir Ierome Bowes; then came Nailor, hauing the Gauntletborne before him vpon a ſwords point, a truncheon (taper-wiſe) tipt with horne, about an elle long, and a ſhield of hard leather carried after him; and ſo was conueied to his Tent by Sir Henry Cheiney.

(137) The Court ſet, and the Combatters called, Naylor entred the liſts, being led by the hand by Sir Ierome Bowes, where making his obeiſance, hee came to the barre, and there held vp his Shield. Then was Thorne brought into the liſts by Sir Henry Cheiney and with like reuerence hee held vp his Sheild. Whereupon an oth was miniſtred to the approuer, the tenor whereof he ſpake as followeth. Heare this you Iudges, that I haue this day neither eate, drunke, nor haue vpon me either bone, ſtone, ne graſſe, or any enchantment, ſorcery, or witch-craft, where-through the power of the word of God might bee inleaſed or diminiſhed, and the Diuels power increaſed: and that my appeale is true, ſo helpe me God and his Saints, and by this Booke.

The oth miniſtred to the Challenger.

(138) Then was Proclamation made in her Maieſties name, that no perſon of what ſoeuer eſtate, degree, or condition there preſent, bee ſo hardy to giue any token or ſigne, by countenance, ſpeech, or language, either to the prouer, or to the defender, whereby the one of them may take aduantage of the other: and no perſon to remooue, but keepe ſtill his place: and euery perſon to keepe their ſtaues and their weapons to themſelues; and ſuffer neither the ſaid prouer, nor defender to take any of their weapons, or any other thing that may ſtand either to the ſaid prouer or defender any auaile, vpon paine of forfeiture of Lands, Tenements, Goods, Chattels, and impriſonment of their bodies, and making fine and ranſome at the Queenes pleaſure. But when all theſe Ceremonies were ended, the Lord Chiefe Iuſtice ſtood vp, and forbad the proceedings, alotting Paramour the Lands with the satisfying of the plaintifes, and thereupon commanded Nailor to giue Thorn againe his Gauntlet, which he vnwillingly did; and so the Combate being ended, we may haue leaue to proceed.

AD. 1573.

(139) Peace flourishing in England, to no great liking of the Seminary, that often sought to disturbe it: the Regent of Scotland craued aide of her Maiestie, for the defence of the young King, and the Countrie, endangered at that time with ciuill broiles. She as tender in her affection, as he dutifull in his alleageance, sent him fifteene hundred men, wherof Sir William Drury Knight Marshall of Berwicke was Generall. These comming to Edenborough laid battery to the Castle, with no lesse then thirty Canons, and were as valiantly resisted by the Scotish within, but for want of fresh water, and no aide to bee expected, the souldiers sick, hurt, ouer-wearied, and diuided in opinion, Lord Peteroe being let downe from the walle, by composition the Castle was surrendered, to the vse of the young King, whereupon the English returned to Berwick.

(140) This time of Elizabeths, like vnto that of Augustus, when the Temple of Ianus stood (for the most part) continually shut, made London like Rome, to be most magnificently repaired, and with many stately edifices adorned; among which for beauty and commodious vse, none is more famous then the Royall Exchange (so named by her Highnesse) whose Founder was Sir Thomas Gresham Knight, Agent to her Maiesty, built for the confluence and commerce of Merchants, whose Traffikes were great, and in these times of peace, extended their Nauigations into the fartheſt (and till then, vnsearched) parts of the world.

(141) For the searching and vnsatisfied spirits of the English to the great glorie of our Nation, could not bee conteined within the banckes of the Mediterranean or Leuant Seas, but that they passed farre, towards both the Articke and Antarticke Poles, enlarging their trades into the West and East Indies: to the search of whose passage, that worthy Sea-captain Sir Martin Furbusher, made Saile into the North-East-Seas, farre further then any man before him had euer done, giuing to these parts the name of Queene Elizabeths foreland.

(142) The next yeere hee attempted thirtie leagues further, when finding gould Ore (as was thought) and taking a man, woman, and Child, of the Sauage Catayaes, he returned into England; but as his gold proued drosse, so these liued not long, neither turned that discouery to any great profit, though it was againe the third time assaied by himselfe, and since by other most famous Nauigators; the North-west by Englishmen being lately descried, to bee Seas more safe, and the passage of farre better hope.

(143) Among these Sea-worthies our famous Vlisses, Sir Francis Drake is the first in the rancke, who the yeere of Christ Iesus 1577 and fifteenth of November set saile from Plimmouth in a Fleete of fiue ships, and one hundred, sixty foure men, who hauing put of Cape de Verd, in the beginning of February, he saw no land, till the fifth of Aprill following, being past the line, thirtie three degrees of latitude, in the 36. degree entred the Riuer Plate; whence hee fell with the straite of Magellan the one and twentie of August, which with three of his ships he passed, hauing cast-off the other two as impediments vnto him, and the Mariegold tossed from her Generall after passage, was no more seene; but the other whereof Master Iohn Winter was Captaine, shaken also off by tempest, returned through the straites, and recouered England; onely the Pellican whereof himselfe was Admirall, held on her course to Chily, Coquimbo, Cinnano, Palma, Lima, vpon the West of America, where he passed the line the first day of March, and so forth till he came to the Latitude 47. thinking by those North-Seas to haue found passage to England. But fogs, frosts and cold windes forced him to turne his Course South-West from thence, and came to anchor 38. degrees from the line, where the King of that Countrey presented vnto him his networke Crowne of many coloured feathers, and resigneth therewith his Sceptre of gouernement vnto his deuotion, his people so admiring our men that they sacrificed vnto them, as to their Gods. This place for the glory of England, he named Nous albion according to her ancient name; and at his departure areared a Monument to witnesse what there had beene done, which was a plate of brasse fixed in an eminent place, wherein was engrauen her Maiesties name, and her right to that prouince, as freely giuen vnto her deputy both by King and people. Wherein also was written the yeere and day of their entrance, and of the lands deliuerance; vnder which plate he put her Maiesties picture and armes in a peece of Siluer to reteine the memory of this seruice vnto posteritie. From thence the foureteenth of November he fell with Ternate one of the Iles of Moluco, being courteously entertained of the King, and from thence he came vnto the Iles of Celebes, to Iaua Maior, to the Cape Buona Speranza, and fell with the Coasts of Guinea, whence crossing againe the line, he came to the height of the Azores, and thence into England vpon the third of Nouember and yeere of Saluation 1580. after he had beene at Sea with such fortunate successe the space of three yeeres lacking twelue daies. The small vessell wherein this admirable voyage was performed, was, at her Maiesties commandement, laid vp in the docke besides Deepeford, where it remaineth as a monument of Englands great fame, vnto this day; and the worthy Generall honoured with Knighthood, being the first that by trauell encompassed the Earth, and saw the wonderous workes of God in those great deepes.

(144) The Seas thus knowne, our Merchants began to trade with the Moscouits, and Turkes, whose priuiledge for Traffike the Great Sultan sent them, confirmed vnder his Regall Seale, and at their Ambassadors request (without direction from her Maiestie) made peace with the King of Poland, as by his owne letters sent vnto our Queene is apparant; the Coppy whereof being deliuered vnto mee by him who had beene Deputy Ambassador in Constantinople, I haue here inserted, translated word for word, as followeth.

(145) Most glorious, and in brightnes most splendent woman, and of women the chiefest Prince of the mighty followers of Iesus. Queene of the most famous Kingdome of England, most excellent Elizabeth, most sapient Gouernesse of all the affaires of thy people, and familie of the Nazarites, the most pleasant Spring of brightnesse and glorie, the most acceptable cloude sweet showers, the heire and Lady of perpetuall happinesse, and blessednesse, of the most famous Kingdome of England, to whom all distressed suiters doe flocke for reliefe. Wee wishing from God the mighty Creatour a most fortunate increase of all the affaires of your excellency and happy successe; and offering eternall vowes and praises worthy of our mutuall and perpetuall familiarity and league, and declaring the premisses, and that which followeth with singular decentnesse: We giue you to vnderstand most friendly, that certaine yeeres passed we had continuall wars with Casulbas Prince of Persia, in right of our people, by reason whereof we would not make warre vpon other parts, whereby certaine theeues in the parts of Polonia, called Casakes, and other wicked persons lurking in those confines, daily troubled and grieued our Subiects: now the Persian being vanquished, and by the power of the Almighty Creator, matters in those partes being compounded, we determined to punnish the said persons lurking in Poland, and other parts; and by the Belgerby of Greece our Army being ioined, and sent with our charge by a Prince of Tartaria, in the yeere last passed, a part of the the Kingdome of Polonia, was on our behalfe troubled, and wasted, and the said Casakes, and other wicked persons were punished accordingly to their deserts, which the King of Poland seeing, and sending two messengers to our blessed Port, to inquire, finde out, and punish in full punishment, signified so much vnto vs, and required our acceptation of his present; but we would not allow his petition, but had fully determined againe to send our Army against the said King of Poland; but the Ambassador of your Maiesty remaining in our blessed Port, interposing himselfe, and signifying that he did assist your excellency, with Corne, Gun-powder, Masts, and other things, necessary for warre, out of the confines of Polonia; now when as the Kingdome of Polonia by our meanes was troubled, and your Ambassador declared vnto vs your singuler and peculiar pleasure, the same his declaration and intercession was vnto vs gratefull and acceptable, and your excellency to whom we owe all fauours and honour. Wee wrote our letters to the King of Polonia on this manner; that the said factious wicked persons and Casakes should be found out and fully punished, but if on the behalfe of your Maiesty, a louing league of peace had not bin sollicited for the King of Poland, we would not by any meanes haue entred League with him, but only at your request we haue shewed this grace to the said King and his subiects, and sith our familiarity is mutuall and perpetuall, we thinke it conuenient that your Maiesty ioining your selfe with the Kingdome of Polonia, doe not leaue to continue warre with the King of Spaine, who so long time hath kept warre against you; and if your Maiesty be not grieued to write vnto vs by some trusty man, we vowe, by the aide of the Omnipotent Creator, that all necessary things shall bee on our part finished and ordered, that a speedy dispatch may be made into Spaine wherein for our parts no assistance shall be wanting, whereof you may nothing doubt. Giuen in our Royall Seat at Constantinople in the yeere of Iesus. 1590. and of our Prophet Mahomet, 998. in the moneth called Sadele, the xij.

But from these farre trauels, long, and chargeable aduentures, let vs returne to our neerer home proceedings vnder the Gouernment of our prudent Queene Sheba.

A.D. 1583.

(146) Gregory of that name the thirteenth, and stout stirring man of Rome: seeing Pope Pius his thunderbolts fall short of the marke whereunto they were aimed, thought it necessary to raise that begun foundation (though with ill burnt bricke, and bad tempred mortar) as that his mounted Canons from the height, might reach and command where the other had left: To which purpose hee sollicited Philip King of Spaine, after his fortunes had set him in Portugall Anno 1582 to vndertake warre against Queene Elizabeth either directly or vnderhand, in fauour of the Irish Rebels, vnto which charge he offered not only his holy blessing, and spirituall treasure, but also to acquit him of the fruites of the Archbishopricke of Toledo, long retained in his hands, whilst the Archbishop remained suspended, and the King receiued some millions of Crownes, which the Pope claimed to belong vnto the See of Rome. But Philip not yet ready to attempt vpon England, ioined with him for the Conquest of Ireland; the one, sending sixe hundred men vnder the command of Thomas Stukeley, whom he had lately stiled Marquesse of Ireland, (a profuse and defamed person throughout all Christendome, flying out of England, for his many Piracies, and now imploied to follow the consecrated Standard of the Church;) the other, bearing all the charge with an addition of three hundred Spaniards; sending money with them to wage foure thousand men more; and the more to kindle the flames of Rebellions, Doctor Sanders (the Arch-Rebell and English Fugitiue) was sent from the Popes holy side.

(147) These landing in Ireland and Countie of Kerry, vpon a Promontory shooting it selfe into the west Sea, raised their consecrated standard, built their Fort Del-Ore, and with many threats gaue forth that the Country should shortly know wherefore they were come: and Desmond, a man desperate to euill, put in action by papall authoritie, had laid his hopes no lower (by these aides now arriued) then presently to become the sole King of Ireland, as Benhadad boasted ouer Israel before his harnesse was put on.

(148) To salute this puppet King, and to welcome these papals with such entertainement as his martiall sword would allow, Arthur Lord Grey Baron of Wilton, then Deputie of Ireland, hasted to Dingle, and so to Del-Ore, where he bad them to so sharpe a banquet, that all the Spaniards, Italians, and Biscayes, notwithstanding their bragging brauadoes yeelded their weapons at the first brunt, and vpon the points of the aduersaries died without mercy. the Captaines, Coronell, Secretary and few more reserued for ransome. The Fort they had stored with money, Bisket, Bacon, Oile and wine, sufficient to hold out the space of sixe moneths, and furnished with powder, shot, and armour sufficiently for two thousand men: with them all the Irish as well women as men died; and Desmond driuen into extreeme want, fearing the prick of euery thorne, and the shadow of euery bush, notwithstanding he was armed with an Agnus Dei, and an enchanted ring sent from the Popes owne finger hung about his necke, yet could he not keepe his traiterous head vpon his shoulders; when like a wolfe wandering in the woods for his pray, was in a poore Cottage wounded by a souldier rushing in vpon him, and being knowne was presently cut shorter by the head. But with his ende, ended not the troubles of Ireland, especially those parts of Vlster, that lay most remote from England.

(149) And whereunto, Walter Earle of Essex, accompanied with the Lord Rich, and others, had formerly made an expedition, aswell to reduce those wilde Irish vnto a more ciuil life and respectiue obedience vnto the English Crowne, as to winne them to the knowledge of Christ, whom they most ignorantly worshipped. But the death of this Noble man hapning before his intendments could bee accomplished, left that to be followed by others which himselfe had begun.

Walter Earle of Essex, in Ireland.

(150) The troubles of which Prouince we haue partly touched vnto the death of Shan O-Neale, whose segnories by Parliament were inuested into the Queenes hands, and a Law enacted, that from thence forth no man should assume the name or title of O-Neale. After which some small blastes of peace breathed vpon those parts; till shortly Turlogh Leinigh, a brothers son of Con-More the Grandfather of this Shan, by a popular election tooke that stile vpon him, a man stept farre in yeeres which made him more quiet, and much the rather for feare of Shan O-Neales sonnes, but especially of Hugh Baron of Dungannon the sonne of bastard Mathew, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in Marriage, and the said Baron had lately repudiated and cast off.

The name or title of O Neale forbidden.

(151) This Turlogh was most obsequious and seruiceable to Queene Elizabeth, stirring no troubles to the English, though to his neighbours the Irish he proued most sterne: For, O-Donell hee disquieted, the Scots of the Islands he molested, and in an incounter slew Alexander Oge the slayer of Shan O-Neale, and indeed became so fearefull, that his sonne in law Hugh, lay hid from him in his owne Country, and lastly escaped his hands into England: where to raise himselfe from his obscure estate and condition hee got command of a troupe of Horse, with a pension of a thousand markes by yeere from the Queene. Whose seruice against the Rebellious Desmond, was so well performed and accepted, that he obtained the place and title of Earle of Tir-Oen, pleading the Letters patent of King Henry the eight granted to his Grand-father, and his heires males, whereof himselfe was the sonne of Mathew created Baron of Dungannon by the same King. conditions resigned vnto him the Gouernment of Vlster where shortly cõbining himselfe with the men of most might, they together associated their strẽgths to defend the Romish religion, for that was the mantle that euer couered their hatched rebellions.

Mac Guyre.

(152) The first Champion that founded the Alarum was Mac-Guyre a man of a turbulent spirit, thrust forward by Guaran a Priest, whom Pope Vrbane the second had ordained Primate of Ireland, commanding him in the name of God to fight there the Lords Battaile, assuring him by his Apostolicall warrant, of most fortunate proceedings and happy successe. But see how this great Prophet was deceiued; for by the valour of Sr. Richard Bingham, Mac Guyre was discomfited, and the primate Priest slaine in the field.

Guaran bought his primacy at a deere rate.

(153) The Confederacy thus broken, Mac-Guyre set himselfe for open rebellion; whom Tir-Oen in shew of his dutifull obedience pursueth, and was so forward in seruice, that hee receiued a wound in his thigh to his no little honour. Whereupon he became of greater respect in the English Court, and more enhaunsed in his owne esteeme; so that hee feared not to exhibite Complaints against the Lord Deputy Sr. William Fitz-Williams, the Marshall whose sister hee had married, and the Garrisons souldiers that garded those parts. But the Deputy recalled, and Sr. William Russel appointed in his place; as if all quarrels had beene quite forgotten, became vnto the new Lord Deputy, and exhibited an humble submission vpon his knees, wherein hee dolefully expressed his inward griefe, in that her Maiesty had conceiued some indignatiõ against him. His absenting himselfe from the State, he confessed was disagreeable to his obedience, albeit to be somewhat excused by the hard measure (as he alleaged) of the late Deputy, and Marshall that were combined for his destruction. Hee acknowledged that the Queenes Maiesty had aduanced him in title, dignity and great liuings, and himselfe vnworthy of any, but rather dishonour and ruine, if he should become vngratefull vnto so good a Prince. With these and the like complement of his true heart and meaning, hee possest the Counsell of Ireland, that albeit Sr. Henry Bagnall the Marshall was present, and charged him with many subornations of Mac-Guyre, the Primate, the beseege of Inis-Kellin and others, hee was by them dismissed and sent home, to the great discontent of the Queene and disquietnesse of the Land, as afterward followed, and in course of time and story shall be declared.

(154) Long before these last Irish troubles, (as you may obserue in the relation of some former attempts against the Queene) the brands of dissention were blowne vnto flames, betwixt Queene Elizabeth of England and Philip the Second of that name King of Spaine; whose first breaking-faith was in the Netherlanders cause, the one persecuting, and the other defending the religion that those people profest; and thus it began in the yeere of Grace. 1575. Don Lewis, gouernor of those Low Coũtries for the said King, sent his Agent vnto Queene Elizabeth, desiring her to banish such of them as repaired to England, onely their flight, and their religion all the cause alleaged against them.

Edward Grimston in hist. Nether: lib.10

The Spanish hostility with England.

Don Lewis sent to haue the Netherlanders banished out of England.

(155) Her answere was short and nothing acceptable, that she held it vnworthy the Maiesty of a Prince to chase away those poore exiled and scattered Netherlanders, that were fled into her Dominions, for the safety of their liues, and to auoid the Spanish tyranny, exercised onely in case of their consciences. And yet she forbad some men of speciall note, as also such as bare Armes, to enter England, vpon condition that Westmerland should bee banished the Low Countries with such other Rebels as had fled to the Spaniard. But the Clergy intending to bring their Spanish Inquisition into those parts, the Prince of Orange entred conference with the States of Holland and Zeland, touching the defence of their professed religion, and the preseruation of their distressed Countries, vnable of themselues (as was alleaged) long to defend themselues, and therefore it was thought fittest to choose them a Protector.

Conference among the States how to withstand the Spanish Inquisition.

(156) This passing for currant among the Counsellors of estate, three were in name, the Emperour, the French King, and the Queene of England; for they were past all hope of any assurance with Spaine. Yea of these in choice, some excepted against, as neither safe nor conuenient to be yeelded vnto. Against the Empire was alleaged the diuersities of religion, the small vnion of those Germane Princes, and hauing their hands full to keepe their owne at home, would bee the lesse able to assist with helpe abroad. The French (they feared) had wasted their money the onely meanes for warre) with their owne ciuill dissentions; if not, yet might they hardly be trusted, as witnessed the cruell massacre lately committed. England then was the Pillar to which they must leane; their Queene the greatest of all Christian Princes, their Nauy the Commandresse of the Seas, and their people professing the same Religion with them, the surest band of Christian society: further it was alleaged that the Realmes of Denmarke and Sweden desired it, the County of Emdem and the Hanse Townes in the East intreated for it, Brabant and Flanders sought it; yea and the rightfull Title of the Princes Elizabeth, issued from the Earles of Holland and Zeland by the Lady Philip, daughter to william the third of that name, Earle of Henault and Holland, did warrant it.

Obiections against the Emperor.

Obiectiõ against the French King.

Queene Elizabeth chosen to be the defender.

The reasons alleaged to haue Elizabeth their gouernor.

(157) Thus then concluded, the States were sent vnto England, and made the end of their comming knowne to the Queene; who wisely weighing into what a Labirinth shee should enter, sought rather the safety of her owne, then to consent to their motion; for Spaine shee well knew would storme at the Vnion, and France bee in great iealousie to haue such a neighbour; shee therefore promising to bee a mediator vnto the King of Spaine for their peace; and after some complements of Princely entertainments with thankes for their offer, and sufferance to carry with them many voluntary English souldiers, let them depart: whose deniall made knowne, was nothing welcome to those distressed Prouinces.

The States of the Low Countries sent to the English Queene.

(158) Long after this, Lewis the Gouernour liued not, whom Don Iohn of Austria (base brother to King Philip) succeeded; who at first made shew of most fauourable affection, yet so, as vrging their subiection to Spaine; and obedience to the Apostolicall See of Rome. Neither would hee come to their Counsell, without Hostages deliuered, and most of their troupes to guard his suspecting person, esteeming them Lutherans and Heretikes, in whom was no trust.

Don Iohn made gouernour of the Low Cõtries.

(159) These moued the States once more to sue vnto her Maiesty, that by her meanes, with peace they might enioy the ancient Priuiledges of their Prouinces, and the freedome of their own consciences against the Inquisition and Tyranny of Spaine; and indeede so lamentably deplored their case, that the pitty-full Queene sent into Spaine, to desire the King in commiseration to withdrawe these extremities from the distressed. But Philip deafe on that eare, and Iohn planting his Garrisons with suspicious intents, Elizabeth began to looke to the maine, sending the King word, shee liked not that his Souldiers should bee her bad neighbours, and the Gouernour notice that she would not suffer the Christian Netherlanders to be tyrannized by his Spaniards. And thereupon caused the value of forty thousand Angels in Bullion, vnminted (in part of an hundred thousand pound sterling promised) to bee sent vnto Brusels, receiuing the States obligations for the same: where also were confirmed certaine conditions betwixt her and them.

terposing himselfe in the Scotish affaires, yea, and by the destruction of Queene Elizabeth, whereto hee is said to haue got the Popes good furtherance. But whether by poison or discontents this great conceited Monarch left the Crowne of England where it gloriously stood, and laid his owne head in the graue of death.

Iohn de Serres. page. 685.

(161) And indeed so glorious was Elizabeths fame, growne now more potent by the Low Countries engagements, that the wise Statists of France, feared their owne Starre would be dimmed at the presence of her bright Sunne. For Henry their King, though he made great shewes to doe much, both in the Church and Counsell of State; in feasts, in maskes, and in treading the measures of dances, dallied out both day and night in vnmeasurable delights: And yet the Clergy to hold in their owne hands the raines of Church-gouernment, with Bels, Bookes, and Beads, sounded forth the zeale of his religious piety in the eares of their auditories: And to manage all temporall affaires at their owne dispose, the Queen Mother, and the Guize laide loose the bridle in his owne necke, not abridging his pleasures with their grauer aduices. But lest the English maiden Queene should bee a maule to the Churchmens Massings, or disturbe these State-guiders by claime (as she had done) of her owne right in France; the mariage motioned nine yeeres before, betwixt their Kings brother Francis Valois Duke of Anion, and Elizabeth Englands faire Queene, was againe solicited in hope by this match to make her wholly theirs, the better to establish their peace: & so effectually was the sute mooued, and so acceptably heard of her Maiesty, that the Monsieur came ouer in person to wooe her himselfe; though to the little liking of many Nobles, and great discontent to the Commons, as (amongst other appearances) was made knowne by a booke written against it, for which (by reason of some personall and ouer-lauish passages) the * Inditor lost his hand. But whether her Maiesty affected not marriage, or disliked the man, or else out of her tender care not to giue the least griefe or distaste to her Subiects, after most Princely and magnificent entertainment shee let him depart without any promise of a nuptiall knot.

His departure.

(162) The fame of this Duke was very renowned, and much the more by the English Queenes fauours; in so much, that the distressed vnited Prouinces, after they had declared Philip of Austria (then King of Spaine) by his too violent Gouernment against their priuiledges (whereunto hee had sworne) to be an enemy vnto their state and peace, and therfore vpon breach of couenants to haue fallen from his interest among them, chose this hopefull Monsieur to bee their Protector, as a Prince most powerfull to defend their cause; of whose triumphes and French treacheries there, let Serres and Petit report for me.

(193) He dying in France (penitent and sorrowfull for what hee had done) and William of Nassau Prince of Orange (by an Edict from Spaine proclaimed a Traitor, his Lands and goods giuen to them that could bring him either dead or aliue, with a further reward of twenty fiue thousand Crownes annuall) was first dangerously wounded in the face with a Pistoll, and at last murthered with the like shot by the base hand of an odious traitor at his Court in Delfe in Holland; whereupon the oppressed Prouinces once more sued for reliefe, both to her Maiesty of England, as also vnto Henry the French King.

(164) Shee much disliking the cruelties of Spaine, whose hands were thus dipt in the bloud of this Prince, commended their cause vnto King Henry by an honorable * Ambassage. But hee, finding himselfe ouermastered at home, and in danger of the Guize and the league; himselfe without forces, and theirs growne very strong; recommended their distresses vnto Queene Elizabeth by his owne Ambassadour, promising her by the faith of a King, assistance for those Netherlanders relieue: and the like request hee made vnto the King of Nauarre in their behalfes. Hereupon their Procurators were sent into England, with full Commission to dispose of their Prouinces at the Queenes pleasure.

Earle of Darby Ambassador into France.

A.D. 1585.

(165) Her Councell then assembled to conferre of the businesse, many waighty considerations amongst them were mooued, and lastly concluded, that her Maiesty ought to accept of the offer. The defence of Gods Gospel was the first motiue she being the nursing mother of Christs distressed Saints; The Spanish Inquisition, that without respect had persecuted her Subiects contrary to right, was too cruell to be tollerated: Philips Army with flying colours sent lately into Ireland vpon gift made vnto him by the Pope, with a purpose of the like enterprize for England, bewraied their intents; and lastly the hard measure that was to bee expected for England, if the Spaniards seated in these neere Netherland Prouinces was to be preuented. These important reasons for her owne State, and pitty of theirs, moued her Maiesty to become their Defendor, but would in no wise take the Title of Soueraigne Lady thereof, which they would haue conferred vpon Her and her heires.

(166) And thereupon Articles being drawne, (to the nũber of thirty) Sir Iohn Norris (a renowned Marshall man) was appointed Generall of fiue thousand foote, and a thousand Horsemen English, all retained at her Maiesties pay during the said warres; which monthly amounted to twelue thousand fiue hundred, twenty sixe pound sterling, accounting 56. dayes to the moneth, according to the Contract. For which monies so disbursed, the Townes of Flushing and Brill, with two Skonces, and the Castel of Ramekins in Holland, were deliuered to her Maiesties vse in pledge, vntill the money were repaied: these Couenants were dated at Nonsuch the tenth of August in Anno 1585.

(167) This Protection, vndertaken by the Queene of England, was very ill taken by King Philip of Spaine; neither better digested by the Pope his holy Father, as was shewed in two lying libels published against her: where amongst other things, shee was taxed with Ingratitude towards King Philip, who in the raigne of her sister, was said to haue saued her life, and that treacherously she had sought the death of the Prince of Parma the present Gouernour in those parts vnder the said King: vnto which impudent slanders shee made answere in a booke printed both in English and French, shewing the shamefull vntruth of those imposturous liers, and the reasons that led her to assist those poore distressed States; whereof these were a part.

For testimony of which, there are extant sundry Authentique treatises and transactions for mutuall commerce, intercourse and straite amity of ancient times; as betwixt King Henry the sixth, and Philip the Second Duke of Burgundy; which was reuiued by Duke Charles his sonne (Father to the King of Spaines Grand-mother, and husband to the Lady Margaret, sister to King Edward the Fourth) and againe confirmed by King Henry the Seuenth and the Arch-Duke Philip, Grand-father to the King of Spaine. And of later yeeres betwixt King Henry the Eight, and Charles the Fifth, Emperour of Almane, Father to Philip now

In all which treatises it was at all times specially contained in expresse words, that the naturall people and Subiects of either side should shew mutuall fauours and duties one to the other: But now Philip of Spaine departing the Low-Countries, and appointing Spaniards, Forreiners and Strangers, men exercised in warre, and delighted in blood to bee chiefe Gouernours of all the saide Low-Countries, contrary to their ancient lawes & customes, who vpon ambition, and for priuate lucre haue violently broken the Liberties, as the people alleadge; and in a tyrannous sort haue banished, killed and destroyed within the space of a few monethes many of the most ancient and principall persons, of the naturall Nobility, haue brought in intestine warres, made the Country in a manner desolate by famine, sword, and other exactions. So that the people are forced for the safety of their liues to seeke the protection of other forraine Lords, or rather to yeeld themselues wholy to the soueraignetie of some mighty Monarch, as not onely by the ancient laws of their Countries they may, but euen by speciall priuiledges granted to the people by some of the Lords and Dukes of the Prouinces as they doe affirme, whereby they are free from their former homages, and at liberty to make choise of any other to be their Prince and head.

Bernardyn Mendoza the Spanish Lieger Ambassador practiseth an inuasion.

(169) Besides these reasons concerning them, the practises of Bernardin de Mendoza (Lieger Ambassador in England for Philip King of Spaine) who by the directions of Francis Throgmorton, contriued to bring in a forraine power to the destruction of Englands estate, it was not onely holde a worke of piety to defend these distressed Christians, but also a necessary policy to aide the Low-Countries Protestants with Englands supply, the better to impeach these dangerous assignes. And how ioyous her protection was to these Prouinces, the deliuery of Flushing with the Castell of Ramekins vnto Sir Philip Sidney, and the Brill vnto Sir Thomas Cecill, appointed by her Maiesty the Gouernours thereof, is witnessed by the letters of Prince Maurice himself, wherin hee signified the great ioy and hopes that he conceiued, and his willing surrender of the same towne Flushing, being his patrimoniall inheritance.

(170) Things ordered thus among these great Potentates, Robert Dudley Baron of Denbigh, was the man, whom the Queene appointed to bee her Deputy Generall, honourable by birth, being the Duke of Northumberlands sonne, by creation Earle of Leicester, and of the Order of the Gartar, gracious in the eye of his Soueraigne, and sufficientlie sorted with all courtly complements, who being accompanied with a gallant traine of Earles, Barons, and other great Persons of England, landed in Zealand the nineteenth of December, and thence was honourably conuaied vnto Dunbage in Holland, where hee was enstalled, and the States tooke their oath to the Queene, which no sooner was accomplished, but that a suspition began to arise; vpon this occasion.

A.D. 1587.

(171) The States hauing drawne instructions of Counsell for their Countries affaires, presented the same to their new made Gouernour, whose answere was, that such instructions would proue limitations, which his authority now being absolute, could no wayes indure: they greatly mistrusting whereat hee did aime, bewailed the miseries whereunto their Country seemed to bee brought, and suffered him to choose his Counsellors of Estate, and to stampe his owne Armes both in their great and Counter-Seale: which when the Queene their assister vnderstoode, shee was offended both with them and him, supposing her selfe to bee drawne further then euer shee entended, or that she had yeelded vnto in the Declaration, where her selfe had granted to bee their Aider, but neuer would graunt to bee the Soueraigne of those Countries.

The States mistrust, & Leicesters pride.

(172) Things thus passing betwixt England and the United Prouinces, the English Marchants, Ships and goods were arrested in Spaine, which caused many to leaue the trade of Marchandizing, and to become men of Warre on the Seas, where alwayes the Spaniard, whosoeuer wanne, went to the worst. But on the land, the Prince of Parma held Plea; for whose further safety Pope Sixtus the fift sent him a consecrated sword with a hatte, and to his men of Warre the Apostolicall blessing, with eternall life for them that should die in the Catholike Romish faith.

Troubles in traffick vpon the seas.

A consecrated Sword sent to Prince Parma.

(173) Another feare was blowne into the Netherlanders eares, which sore troubled them, though without all cause; for it was diuulged by sinister reports, that Queen Elizabeth meant to make peace with the King of Spaine, without either mention or regard for the safety of her vnited Confederates. Shee touched in honour, whereof shee was euer iealous, wrote her letters to Prince Parma in answere of his, that had mentioned the same, and to these doubtfull Netherlanders, to assure them the contrary, both which were dated from Richmond vpon one and the same day.

The feares of the distressed Netherlanders.

(174) Now Leicester not liking to lie still, and doe nothing, made his preparation for Zutphen, which being in want of victuals, the Prince of Parma sought to supply, to intercept which, Sir Iohn Norris was sent, and to the saide seruice came the Earle of Essex, the Lord Willoughby, Sir Philip Sydney, Sir William Stanley, and Sir William Russell, in all two hundred horse, and fifteene hundred Musketiers and Pikes: the Parma hauing seauen hundred horse, and two thousand foote, appointed with the like defence.

July 19. A.D. 1586.

(175) The day being darke through great foggy mists, the Spaniard whilest their Wagons made forward, stayed in a place of aduantage neere vnto Zutphen, vpon whom the English were entred before they were aware, and were entertained with a furious charge of shot, which notwithstanding they abode, and so valiantly followed the skirmish, that they ouerthrew a cornet of horse, and tooke Cressier the Captaine thereof prisoner, and after him Count Hanniball Gonzaga, another Cornet also they put backe and slew. But in this, the day was made vnfortunate, that the worthy Sir Philip Sidney as he changed his horse, was shot by a Musket aboue the left knee, which so shiuered the thigh-bone, that the Bullet could not bee recouered, of which wound he died fiue and twenty dayes after, to the no little griefe of her Maiesty, and many others, for the great hopes they had of that worthy Gentleman; in whom were compleat all vertues and valours that could bee required or residing in man.

A conflict at Zutphen.

Sir Philip Sidney shot with a musket, whereof he died.

(176) Good seruice done vpon the Sconces neer Zutphen, so that the Towne seemed to be blocked vp; his Excellency (so did they now enstile the Earle) made Rowland Yorke the Gouernour thereof, and ouer Deuenter Sir William Stanley, to the great discontents of the Estates, for that Yorke had beene a double Traitor in seruice, and Stanley before time had serued the Spaniard. Other grieuances also they then beganne to complaine of, and by Petition to his Excellency sought the redresse; but hee minding for England, with faire words held them in expectance vntill such time as hee should returne againe.

Yorke and Stanley made gouernors of townes.

(177) The State-Souldiers found themselues agreeued, that they were not dealt with according to custome, degrees or desert, (as that the Sergeant should be aduanced to be Ensigne, the Ensigne Sergeant Maior, and so vpward) they venturing their liues to winne reputation. And the Earle of Holocke held himselfe much wronged, in that Sir Edward Norris vpon words spoken at Table, sent him a letter of challenge to fight with him body to body; the Earle then lying sicke of a wound receyued at Zutphen, which hee disdainefully tooke, as being his vnequall vnequall, and partly imputed it to the sufferance of his Excellency. But more neerely touched the losse of Deuenter and Seonne at Zutphen, traiterously solde vnto the Spaniard by Sir William Stanley, and Rowland Yorke Englishmen, whom Leicester had left there at his departure. These things drone the Counsell of State into many icalousies, that the English entended as the French had done.

An. D. 1587

(178) The occasion that moued the Lord Generall to return into England, was for his presence in Parliament, wherein was handled the waighty cause of that great Princesse Mary Queene of Scotland, whose vntimelie death and vnfortunate end was finished at Fotheringhay Castle in the County of Northampton, to the great discontent of her Maiesty, as was manifestly seene * to all her people, by the griefe shee conceiued, and high displeasure shee tooke against the forward * Actor, both in casting him into the Tower of London, and neuer admitting him after into her presence, or his place. The bodie of the deplored Queene was solemnly interred in the Cathedrall Church of Peterborow, where it yet remaineth vnder a hearse of blacke veluet.

(179) In this absence of Leicester euery seuerall Captaine tooke vpon him the place of a Generall whereby many desperate seruices were attempted, and great Robbery by their Souldiers committed, so that it was feared all would come to ruine. To preuent which, a Counsell for State was assembled at Dunbage, where Maurice Nassau, the younger sonne of William Prince of Orange was elected their Gouernor, and the Prouinces sworn vnto him, with a reseruation had vnto her Maiesty; when also a great complaint was sent into England, which to examine, the Lord Buckhurst was sent into Holland; at whose doings Leicester tooke offence, but especially against Sir Iohn Noris (that renowned Leader) whom to the great dislike of the States, hee caused to bee recalled, and sent into Ireland.

(180) Leicester the Lord Generall hoping to recouer his wel nigh lost reputation, landed in Zeland, gallantly accompanied, where hee made a forwarde shew of great seruice; but such was the successe, that Sluce was surrendred, and the occasion thereof partly imputed to him; when also beganne many factious abettings betwixt the Estates and his Excellency, so that some Townes vtterly reiected his gouernment, and hee againe sought to seize vpon some other.

(181) The care of preuenting further mischiefes, moued her Maiesty hereupon to recall the Earle of Leicester into England, well knowing that a Kingdom diuided could not long stand: who on his returne, shee commanded to resigne his gouernment of the Netherlanders into the hands of the Generall Estates, which was performed by act, signed vnder his hand, and sent vnto them: which resignation receiued, was presently proclaimed through al the Prouinces, to the end that euery man might know himselfe discharged of his oath to the Earle of Leicester.

(182) Now Philip King of Spaine espying these dissentions, thought it a fitte aduantage for him to worke vpon, hauing a long time proiected an attempt for England, and at that time preparing a mighty Nauie vpon the seas. To cast therefore a mist ouer her Maiesties eyes, and to driue all icalousies out of her head, hee importuned by all meanes the Realmes vnto peace. Shee measuring other princes by her owne true meaning, and peacefull dispositions, gaue eare to his guilefull lullaby without suspition of any snake to be hid in so flourie a garden; and therefore sent to the Estates to vnderstand their resolution for an vniuersall peace, protesting that if they stood out, shee would withdraw her whole forces from thence.

(183) They, like themselues answered with a bold deniall, neither thought they that shee could haue any peace with him that was head of the holy League, and persecuted the exercise of the reformed Religion, whose policy (as they feared) was but to detract time, till his sea prouisions were better ripened, as indeed the sequell soone proued, the terror of this prepared, and Inuincible Nauy (as the Spaniards tearmed it) spreading it selfe wide, and menacing fearefull stormes both vnto the English and Flemish; insomuch that the Estates like prouident respecters of themselues, and thankeful men to their Protectresse, prepared their shippes of warre to assist her Maiesty, and pressed a thousand sailers of the Netherlanders for her seruice on seas.

(184) During this brute of the Spanish proceedings, Commissioners were sent out of England to conferre vpon conditions of the pretended peace with the Duke Parma, Lieutenant for the King of Spaine, who for that purpose came to Ostend. For her Maiesty were assigned Henry Earle of Derby, William Lord Cobham Warden of the Cinque-ports, with Sir Iames Croft, and others. For King Philip were Maximilian Earle of Aremberg, Gouernour of Antwerpe, Monsieur Richardot President of Arthois, and Counsellor of State, besides other Ciuillians. (185) The demaund of the Queene was, to haue a surcease of Armes, with a present and vndelayed truce, mistrusting the Kinges preparation at Sea; the sending away of forraine Souldiers out of the Low-Countries for Englands safety, a restitution of such summes of money as the Queen had lent vnto the Estates, which the King had promised by his Edict made at Brusels, that the Netherlanders might enioy their ancient liberties and priuiledges, nor bee gouerned by a stranger, but by a Native Prince; that the Religion might bee permitted for two yeeres at least; and lastly, that the Articles of Pacification of Gant, and other like Treaties might bee obserued: and these being concluded, the Townes shee possessed should bee deliuered vpon such reasonable conditions, as all the world should witnesse shee tooke them not to her owne vse, or commodity, but onely vpon a necessary defence and assurance.

(186) To these the Spaniards replyed, that touching their preparation for Sea, they did assure them it nothing concerned England; to send away their Souldiers, their King could not resolue, vntill that the Netherlanders had submitted themselues vnto him; concerning their priuiledges, it appertained nothing to the Queene, neither should shee prescribe to the King a law; and so farre was hee from tolerating Religion, that hee would not heare thereof, otherwise then hee had allowed vnto other Townes that had submitted vnto his obedience: and the like answere made they for the pacification of Gant.

The Spanish shifts and answeres.

(187) The propositions further vrged, and answered with dilatorie delayes, Pope Sixtus the fourth (who being prime in the intended Tragedie) obseruing well the time, among other beasts sent forth his Bull to thunder out bolts against Englands Queene, confirming the Excommunications of his two predecessors, and depriuing her Maiesty from all princely dignity; for whose finall dispossession, hee then ordained his Catholike sonne Philip of Spaine, commanding all her Subiects, vpon paine of his curse, (oh fearefull bugge-beare) to aid and assist the great, noble, and Inuincible Armie, prepared to that end vnder the command of the Duke of Parma. And Allen an Englishman, an eager Trumpetor to this exploit, now purposely made Cardinall by the Pope (to shew his Holinesse affection to the English Nation) would not lie idle, but set himselfe on work to write a Booke exhortatory to the Nobilitie of England and Ireland, to rouze them vp to the execution of the Popes sentence against their Soueraign, in in assisting K. Philip, who was made the whip in his Holinesse hand, & the Duke of Parma appointed the chiefe Commander in that action, which Booke (fraught with all impudency of diuelish slanders against her sacred person) was printed at Antwerp in Anno 1588.

The Queene sent to Prince Parma.

(188) This Bull and Booke comming to the Queenes knowledge; she sent vnto Parma (who had gained the reputation of some Princely vertues) to deale plainly with her; if so, then meant she no longer to continue the treaty of peace: but he with many Court-like complements denied his authority, neither had seene (as hee said) any such prescripts. Moreouer the English Commissioners pressed the conditions, purposely to finde some footsteps of this close-carried designe, when at last it burst forth in these termes, that the King of Spaine had kept fifty thousand men in pay almost a whole yeere to lie still and doe nothing; to his great charge by the meanes of that treaty. At which very instant, these their hidden traps and toyles apparantly shewed themselues, when the Seas were turretted with such a Nauy of ships, as her swelling waues could hardly be seene, and the Flagges, Streamers, and Ensignes, so spread in the winde, that they seemed to darken euen the Sunne, which put the English Commissioners in some suspition and feare, hauing no hostages for their safe returne.

(189) This Inuincible Nauy long in preparing, and now in a readinesse, was furnished with all prouisions of warres, and with many brauadoes spread their sailes for Englands inuasion, guided by the Prouinciall Generals, whose names, the numbers of Vessels, Ordinances, Sailers, Souldiers, and Slaues, as I finde them recorded, in this ensuing Table are inserted.

The wonderfull and great prouisions in the Spanish Armado.

(190) Admirable (as yee see) was the prouision of this mighty Armado, and so confident was the Spaniard that England should pay the whole shot, that no cost of any thing was at all spared; of bullets for great shot were two hundred and twenty thousand; of powder foure thousand and two hundred kintals, euery kintall containing a hundred waight; of lead for bullets one thousand kintals; and one thousand and two hundred kintals of match; seuen thousand muskets and caliuers; tenne thousand partizans and halberts; with murthering peeces, double Canons, and field peeces for campe; with store of furniture for carriages, Mules and Horses, so that they were sufficiently prouided both for sea and land. Bread and bisket was baked and wine laide aboord for sixe monthes prouision; sixe thousand and fiue hundred kintals of bacon; three thousand of cheese, besides flesh, rice, beanes, pease, oyle and vineger, with twelue thousand pipes of fresh water, store they had of torches, lanthornes, and lampes, canuas, hides and lead to stop leakes, whips, and butcherly kniues; for what vse wee may imagine. In a word by the report of Don Diego Piementell, the army was two and thirty thousand strong and cost the King of Spaine thirty thousand ducats euery day.

Their Regiments.

(191) In this army were fiue regiments of old Spanish souldiers, of the Terties, of Naples, Sicily, and the Terceraes, commanded by fiue Masters Del Campo; the first was Don Diego de Piementel a Knight of the order of S^t. Iohn, brother to the Marquesse of Taueras, and couseu to the Earle of Benenent and Calui: the second Colonel was Don Francisco de Toledo brother to the Earle of Orgas: the third, Don Alonzo de Luzon: the fourth Don Nicholas de Isla or Patritio Anselmo: and the fifth was Augustin Mexia brother to the Marquesse de la Garda who was afterwards made Gouernour of Antwerp; each company hauing in his regiment two and thirty companies, besides the Castilians and Portugals bands, each of them hauing their peculiar gouerners, captaines, officers, colours and weapons.

Their great strength in men.

(192) The Generall of this mighty army was Don Lodouicus Perez Duke of Medina Sidonia, Baron of Saint Lucas, of the Order of the Golde Fleece. The Admirall was Don Iohn Martinez de Richald, the Marshall Don Francisco Bonadille: and the chiefe Counsellers for the warre were Diego Piementell, Floris de Valdez, Pedro de Valdez, Michael Oquendo, Don Alonzo de Lieua, Don Diego Maldonado, and Don Georgio Manriquez. Don Martin Alarcon was ordained Vicar Generall for the holy Inquisition, in whose traine were a hundred Monkes and Iesuits: and Cardinall Allen was appointed the Superintendent of all Ecclesiasticall matters throughout England; who fearing to bee ouertaken with time, translated Pope Sixtus his Bull into English, that it might bee the sooner published vpon the arriuall of the Spanish Fleete into that Kingdome. Of voluntary aduenturers were an hundred twenty foure Noble men, and and Gentlemen of great account; all of them furnished at their owne charges: among whome was the Prince of Ascoli, Alonzo de Leina, the Marquesse of Pennafiel, the Marquesse de Gaues, the Marquesse de Barlanga, the Count de Paredes, the Count de Feluas, and diuers other Marquesses and Earles of Honourable Families of Mendoza, Toledo, Pacheco, Cordouas, Guzma, and Manriques, neither was there any Noble house of Spaine, but had a sonne, brother or Nephew in the voyage, in hope of reuenews and riches in England.

(193) Neither was the Duke of Parma slacke in the businesse; who lying in readinesse to ioyne his forces with this Nauie, set many thousands on work to build ships, to digge and deepen riuers for saile from Antwerpe to Gaunt, and to Bruges, lading three hundred small boates with munition and victuals; as also prepared seauenty others flat bottomde, euery one able to beare thirty horses for transportation, with Bridges ready made to shippe and vnshippe them. Two hundred more were made of the like fashion, though not so bigge, and lay ready in the Hauen of Newport; at Dunkirke lay thirtie seauen shippes of warre, wherin store of pyles were bestowed, sharpened at the end with yron pykes, to pile vp the mouthes of riuers; and at Graueling hee had prouided twenty thousand empty Casks, with Cords and other furniture fitee to make floating Bridges to stoppe vp the Hauens. He likewise had shipped great abundance of Saddles, Bridles, with all other furniture for horse; and horses also for carriage, with Ordinance, and other prouisions of warre.

(194) Neere vnto Newport hee had lying vnder the command of Camillo, thirty Companies of Italians, two of Wallons, and eight of Burguinois, euery Company being an hundred men. At Dyxmew he mustered fourscore Companies of Netherlanders, threescore of Spaniards, threescore of high Dutch, and seauen of rebellious fugitiue English, whereof Sir William Stanley was Generall; at Corricke also were foure thousand lodged, and at Wateme nine hundred horse, ouer whom the Marquesse of Guast was Commander. And to this Land-seruice came the Duke of Pastrana, supposed to bee the Spanish Kings base-sonne: the Marquesse of Bourgon, one of the Archduke Ferdinands sonnes; Don Vespasian Gonsagua of the house of Mantua, a great Souldier, who had beene Viceroy of Spaine, Don Iohn de Medices Bastard of Florence, Don Amedeus bastard of Sauoy, with many others of the like estate.

(195) Neither must you think that Sixtus Quintus the Pope of Rome, did in any wise neglect his diligence and deuotion to this intended inuasion; whose helping hand was shewed in sending forth his Crusado (as hath beene vsed against the Turkes) and publishing a safe pasport for his Philippians to enter into England. Who also for the furtherance of the enterprise, vndertooke to contribute a million of gold, the halfe presently, and the other when any notable Hauen in that land should bee wonne; with this proviso notwithstanding (most wisely inserted) that hee should hold the English Crowne as feudatorie vnto the See of Rome; in earnest whereof, hee bestowed vpon him his Apostolicall benediction, and the Title of the Defendour of the Faith, so liberall was hee, both in his temporall and spirituall largesses, and so forward was Philip to catch at Elizabeths still flourishing Crowne: but her vndanted heart in this present danger, as another Ezekiah, sought vnto the Lord, whose annointed seruant shee was, and who euer had beene her onelie defendant. And for preuenting those long threatned stormes, shee sent Charles Howard Lord Baron of Effingham, high Admirall of England, vnto the seas, where the Lord Henry Seymer kept betwixt Callis and Douer, seconded by the Ships of the vnited Prouinces, in league with the Queene.

(197) The Inuincible Nauie, and terrour of Europe, as the Papals both tearmed, and tooke it to bee, hauing all things prepared, loosed Anchor from Lisbon vpon the nineteenth of May, and made vnto the Groine in Gallicia, it being the neerest Hauen to England, whence hoysing sayles with great hope and pride, bent their course thitherward: but suddenly the heauens hating such hostile actions, powred downe reuenge, by a sore and vnexpected tempest, which draue the Duke of Medina, the chiefe Generall backe againe into the Groine; eight other of their shippes being dispersed on seas; their masts broken and blowne ouer-boord; besides three Portingall Gallies which fell vpon the Coast of Bayon in France, and were set vpon by their owne slaues, whereof Dauid Gwyn an Englishman was the first, who with his fellowes both French and Turks freed themselues by the slaughter of many Spaniards, among whome Don Diego de Mandrana was one.

A tempest afflicteth the inuincible Nauie.

(198) Charles Howard Lord Admirall hearing for certaine that their Fleet was ready to hoise vp their sailes, had sent the worthy Sir Francis Drake, who was constituted his Vice-Admirall, vnto the West parts, with fifty six shippes well appointed, whither himselfe also following with speed, and ioyning his Fleete, their number amounted to one hundred shippes, whereof fifteene were Victuallers, and nine Voluntaries of Deuonshire Gentlemen; many a seruiceable man returning backe for lacke of imploiment or place. These from Plymouth resoluing and * assaying to put forth to seas, were so met with the wind, that past the Syllies they could not attain, and thence also were forced by tempest into the Hauen, from whence they lanched to refresh their ships and companies; where lying at Anker, the scouts at Sea had descryed some sayles of the Spaniards, which had beene likewise distressed by the stormes; but before these could bee haled, the wind came about, and brought them to the Groine, where the rest lay in harbour.

(199) Intelligence spreading that the Spaniards were in want; their great shippes dispersed, the rest storme-shaken, and their men by multitudes slaine with the plague; the Lord Admirall meant to vse the aduantage vpon the first North wind, which came about the eight day of July, and bare his sayle almost within sight of Spaine, when suddenly it changing into the South, and he wisely foreseeing, that the enemy might passe without his discouerie, that the Seas might bee stormy, and his Fleet windbound, and that whilest they thus lay abroad, their seruice much better might be employed at home, hee therefore presently returned, and ankered his Fleet in the Hauen of Plymouth, suffering his men to relieue themselues on land.

The Spaniards agains set forth.

(200) But the Spaniards ships new rigged, and their wants supplyed, their King still hote on his former resolutions, instantly vrged and hastened his Chiefetaines to put againe to Sea, which accordingly was done vpon the eleuenth of Iuly, waying their Ankers at the Groin, where with braue shews and full sailes they came into the Chanels of the narrow Seas, where they cast anker, and dispatched certaine small pinnasses vnto the Duke of Parma, to signifie their arriuall and readines, and to command him in the name of the King to forward his charge for that seruice.

The English haue notice of their approch.

(201) The English Fleet beeing in harbour, and many men on shore, Captain Thomas Fleming (some say a Pyrate) discried the Spaniard vpon the point of the Lizard, the wind being then South and by West: He hastening to Plimouth, made relation thereof vnto the Lord Admirall, the newes was more fearefull, for that it was sodaine, the Queene hauing receiued intelligence for certaine, that this great Armado would not come forth that yeere, their bulkes being so dispersed and bruised, and their wants and sickneſſe so great, vpon which rash reports (a dangerous matter in State-affaires,) so confident she was, that shee sent for foure of her tallest royall shippes, to bee brought againe vnto Chattam; but Flemings vnexpected discouery hindred that purpose, and all hands were set on work to warpe out the Shippes, the winde blowing harde, and hindering the same.

They set foorth from Plimouth.

(202) The next day about noone, this terrible Fleet was descryed by the English, who with a South west wind came forward amaine, and (as seemed) they made for Plimouth. But whether their Commission were otherwise, or for that they saw the English shippes out of the harbour, they passed by, towards Callis, well hoping about those coasts to meet with Prince Parma, by whose wafting that way the English got the wind, and eftsoons gaue them chase, and encounter, where fire, smoake and ecchoing Canons beganne the parley, and bullets most freelie enterchanged betwixt them, were messengers of ech others mind.

Iuly 20.

The English assaile the Spanish.

(203) The next day the two Fleetes fought within Musket shot, where the English Admirall fell most hotely on the Vice-Admirall of Spaine, at which present they well perceiued their owne ouersights; their great shippes (like Castles) powerful to defend, but not offend, to stand but not to moue; and therfore farre vnfit for fight in those narrow seas: their enemies nimble, and ready at all sides to annoy them, and as apt to escape harme themselues, by being low built, and easily shot ouer. Therefore they gathered themselues close in forme of a halfe Moone, and slackned their sailes, that their whole Fleete might keepe together. Notwithstanding, one of their great Gallions, wherein was Don Pedro de Valdez, Vasques de Silua, Alonzo de Sayas, and other Noblemen, was sore battered by the English shot, in auoiding whereof shee fell fowle vpon an other shippe, and ere she could bee cleared, had her fore-mast broken off, which so hindred her saile, that shee was vnable to keepe way with the Fleet, nor they of courage to succour these Lords, but left both shippe and them, in this sudden and vnlooked for distresse. But night comming on, and shee lagging behind, the Lord Admirall supposing neither men nor Mariners to be left within boord, and fearing to loose sight of the Spaniards, past by, and followed the Lanthorne, which hee tooke to be borne by Sir Francis Drake, but that renowned Knight, busied vpon fiue great hulkes pursued them amain, which being haled, were found to be Easterlings, & therupon freed from his further harmes.

A Gallion distressed.

Iuly 22.

(204) The next day following, Sir Francis Drake espying this lagging Gallion, sent forth a Pinnasse to commaund them to yeelde, otherwise his Bullettes should force them without further fauour; but Valdez to seeme valorous answered, that they were foure hundred and fifty strong, that himselfe was Don Pedro, and stood on his honour, thereupon propounding certaine conditions. But the Knight sent his reply, that hee had not leasure to parley, if hee would yeeld, presently doe it, if not hee should well proue that Drake was no dastard; whereupon Pedro hearing that it was the fiery Drake (euer terrible to the Spaniards) who had him in chase with forty of his followers came on boord Sir Francis his shippe; where first giuing him the Conge, he protested, that hee and all his were resolued to die in defence, had they not fallen vnder his power, whose valour and felicity was so great, that Mars and Neptune seemed to attend him in his attempts, & whose generous mind towards the vanquished, had often beene experienced, euen of his greatest foes. Sir Francis requiting his Spanish complements with honourable English curtesies, placed him at his own Table, and lodged him in his owne Cabbin. The residue of that company were sent vnto Plymouth, where they remained eighteene monethes, till their ransomes were paid; but Sir Francis his souldiers had well paid themselues with the spoile of the shippe, wherein were fifty fiue thousand Ducats in gold, which they shared merilie among them. The same day Michael de Oquendo Admirall to the Quadron Guypuſco, and Vice-Admirall to the whole Fleete, suffered no lesse disaster, whose ship being one of the greatest Gallions, fell suddenly on fire, all the vpper part of the shippe, and most of the persons therein consumed, howbeit the Gunpowder in the hold was all saued, and the rest of the scorched Spaniards with the hulke brought into Plimouth, to the great ioy of the beholders.

Don Pedro yeeldeth himselfe.

Iuly 23.

(205) Vpon Tuesday the twenty third of Iuly, the Spaniards approaching right against Portland, the wind came about into the North, as fit as could bee wished to further their designes; but the English agill, and foreseeing all harmes, recouered the aduantage thereof from the Spaniards, and continued that day from morning til night, in battring those vast woodden Castels with shot both great and small; which forced them for their further safety, to gather themselues close into a roundell, their best and greatest ships standing without, & securing the battered and lesse. On this day the soarest fight was performed: wherein, besides other remarkeable harms, a great Venetian shippe with some other smaller, were surprised, and taken by the English.

Iuly 24.

(206) The foure and twenty day of this present Moneth, the fight was onely betweene the foure great Galliasses, and the English ships, the Spaniards hauing the aduantage, theirs being rowed, and our sailes vnfilled, by reason of the calme, which notwithstanding they sore galled the enemy with chaine shot, therewith cutting a sunder their tacklings, cables, and cordage to their no little annoyance. But wanting powder, which so freely they had spent, they sent men on land for a further supply, which ministred dislikes (if not suspitions) to many, that wee should thus want vpon our owne coasts. In which Interim, a Councell was called, wherin it was decreed that the English Fleet should be diuided into foure squadrons, and those committed to foure worthie Captaines, and most skilfull Nauigators, whereof the Admirall in the Arke Royall was chiefe, Sir Francis Drake in the Reuenge led the second, Captaine Hawkins the third, and Captaine Frobisher the fourth. Other most valiant Captaines there were in her Maiesties Shippes, as the Honourable Lord Thomas Howard in the Lion, the Lord Sheffield in the Beare, Sir Robert Southwell in the Elizabeth Ionas, Captain Baker in the Victory, and Captaine George Fenner in the Galeon Leicester.

Iuly 25.

(207) The fiue and twenty of Iuly, the Spaniards

ards were arriued against the Isle of wight, where was a terrible encounter, each shooting off their whole sides, and not aboue six score yards the one from the other, till at length the English so battered the Spanish high Turrets, that they were forced once more to secure themselues in a roundell, and the foresaid Generalls so worthily bare themselues in this conflict, that the Lord Admirall bestowed the Order of Knighthood vpon the Lords Howard and Sheiffeld, Master Iohn Hawkins, Martin Frobisher, and others. And yet (by the Spanish brags) a false rumour was spread in France, that England was wholy conquered by the Spaniard.

July 27. (208) Their Fleete making forward about Sunset, the 27. of the same moneth, came against Doner, and ankered within sight of Callis, intending for Dunkerk, there to ioyne with the Duke of Parma his forces, without which, they well saw, they could doe nothing. The English Fleete following vp hard vpon them cast anker so neere, that they lay within Culuering shot. Where the Lord Henry Seymer vnited his to the Lord Admirals shippes. Meane-while the Duke of Medina sent vnto Parma, to bid him make ready his long expected forces; with which messengers many Noblemen of the Spaniards went on Land, among whom was the Prince of Ascoli the Kings base sonne, who so well liked his shipping, that hee made no great hast againe from shore: wherein he was onely fortunate; for that his Gallion was cast away vpon the Irish coast, and neuer returned to salute Spaine.

(209) Duke Parma hearing the best of this voyage, makes all things ready that lay in his charge; whose hopes were so fixed for Englands Conquest, that the glittering Diadem vpon Queene Elizabeths head, dazeled his ambitious eye, beeing assured by Cardinall Allen, that he was the man designed to bee crowned therewith, and who, from the Pope and Spaine should hold that Kingdome himselfe. Wherefore thinking his Coronet of the Low Countries Gouernment, would but trouble the English Crowne, and both too weighty to be worn vpon one head, he committed that charge vnto Count Mansfeild the Elder, and making his vowes vnto Saint Mary of Hall in Henault, was already in conceit no lesse then a King. But soone the date of his raigne was expired, and his swelling tide fallen into a Low shallow ebbe; for the day following in his march towards Dunkerke hee heard the thundring Ordinance ring the passing peale of his stile and title, and the same euening had newes of the hard successe of the Spaniards, the hoped aduancers of his dreamed fortunes.

The fleete dis-anchored from Calis by stratagem. (210) They lying thē at anker nere Callis, to ioyn their powers with Parmaes, were forced thence by a politike stratageme thus: Their Ships, as Castles pitched in the seas, had their bulkes so plancked with great beames, that bullets might strike and sticke, but neuer passe through, so that little auailed the English Canon, except onely in playing on their masts and tackling; whereupon, by her Maiesties aduise and appointment, eight of the English ships were discharged of men, and filled with gunpowder, pitch, brimstone, and other combustible matter; their Ordinance charged with bullets, stones, chaines, and the like; which vpon Sunday, the eight and twenty of Iuly, at two of the clocke after mid-night, were let driue with winde and tide among the Spanish Fleete, whose Pilots returning, and their traines taking fire, such a suddaine thunder-clap was giuen, that the Spaniards, affrighted in the dead of the night, were stricken into a horrible feare, least all their shippes should bee fired by these; which present mischiefe to auoide, in great perplexity, they hasted to cut their owne Cables, the time beeing too short to weigh vp their ankers; and hoising their sailes did driue at randome into the Seas, in which hast and confusion the greatest of their Galliasses fell foule vpon another ship, and lost her Rudder, so that guideless she droue with the tide vpon a shelue in the shoare of Callis, where shee was assaulted by the English.

July 28.

A Galliasse taken. (211) This Galliasse was of Naples; her Generall, Hugh de Moncada, who fought the more valiantly in hope of present rescue of the Prince of Parma; but Sir Amias Preston gaue so fierce an assault, that Moncada was shot dead with a bullet, and the Galliasse borded, wherein was many a Spaniard slaine, and a number of the rest leaping into the Sea, were drowned; yet Don Antonio de Matiques, a principall Officer, had the hap to escape; and was the first man that brought into Spaine the welcomes of this now vincible Nauy. This huge Bottome, manned with foure hundred souldiers, and three hundred slaues, had in her also fifty thousand Ducats of the Spanish Kings treasure, a booty well fitting the English souldiers affections; who, hauing ransacked all, and freed the slaues from their miserable fetters, went about to set that vessell of Emptines on fire; but Monsieur Guerdon, the gouernour of Callis, fearing some danger to the Towne or Hauen, would not permit them, but discharged his ordnance against such as assaied it.

July 29. (212) The morning after this their miserable hap, ranging themselues againe into order, they approched ouer against Greueling, where once againe the English getting the winde, the Spanish were thereby depriued of the Conueniency of Callis roade, and kept from supply out of Dunkerk; in which port had rested their full hope of support. Notwithstanding they were forced to passe by, and so followed by the English, that their ships discharged vpon them from morning till night, the conflict prouing dismall to the inuincible Armado; for therein a great Gallion of Biscay perished, the Captaines thereof to auoid ignominy, or to be accounted valorous, desperatly slew each others, in which distresse also two other great ships presently sunke. A Gallion taken. The Saint Philip, and Saint Mathew, two Portugall Gallions, were so torn with shot, their tacklings spent, and their bulkes rent, that the water entred in on all sides; in the former of which, was Francis de Toledo, being Colonel ouer two and thirty bands, who taking his course for the Coast of Flanders, the leake was so great, that hee with others, committing themselues to the Skiffe, arriued at Ostend, and the Ship, with the Residue, were taken by the Vlishingers.

(213) In the Saint Mathew was embarked Don Diego Pimentelli, Campe-maister, and Colonel also of thirty two bands; whose Shippe, though very strong, was so pierced with shot, that her Leakes could not be stopt, which knowne, the Duke of Medina sent his skiffe for him; and some others, to saue themselues from their imminent danger. But he, vpon a Spanish braue, refused so to doe, assaying each way to free himselfe like a souldier; but not able to keepe saile with the Fleete, he forthwith made toward the coast of Flanders, where being espied by fiue men of warre, was met with, and required to yeeld, which lastly hee did vnto Captaine Peter Banderduesse; who carried him into Zeland, where, for a trophie of Victory, his Banner was hung vp in the Church of Leiden in Holland, whose length reached from the very roofe vnto the ground: and another Ship of lesse burden coasting also for Flanders, was cast away on the sands.

(214) The Spaniards now finding their BVENVENIDA vnto England far other then they expected, were content to couch their fleete close together, not seeking to assaile but to defend; and the winde comming to the South-west, in the same order passed by Dunkerk, whom the English still followed. But least Parma should play vpon aduantage, the Lord Admirall dispatched the Lord Henry Seymer, with his Squadron of small ships, vnto the coast of Flanders, to second those Hollanders which there kept watch vnder the conduct of

Iustin

The Hollanders Aides.

Iustin Nassau their Admirall: whose Nauy consisted of thirty fiue shippes, furnished with most skilfull Mariners and old experienced souldiers, whereof twelue hundred were Musketiers, whom the States had culled out of the Garrisons. Their charge was, to stop all entrance into their Hauens, or entercourse with Dunkerke, whither Duke Parma intended; though his men were vnwilling, hearing how their friends were welcome at the sea, onely the English fugitiues, about seuen hundred, vnder the command of that treacherous Knight Sir William Stanley, were very forward to bee the first that should assault England.

English fugitiues prooue the most desperate enemies.

(215) But the Armado, being now passed the place of their expected supply, and hauing gotten more Sea-roome for their huge bodied bulkes, * spread their maine sailes, and made away as fast as winde and water would giue them leaue, more fearing the small Fleete and forces of the English, (though nothing in number like vnto them) then standing vpon termes of honour, either of their chieftaines or Inuincible Nauy. But surely, if they had knowne the want of powder that ours sustained, (a fault vnexcusable vpon our owne coasts,) they no doubt would haue stood longer to their tacklings; but God in this, as the rest, would haue vs to acknowledge, that we were onely deliuered by his owne gracious prouidence and Arme, and not by any policy or power of our owne.

The Spanish Armado flieth.

(216) The Vincible Armado holding on their way, the English Admirall followed, least they should assay to put into Scotland; but the winde comming faire, and feare of more encounters, with all their sailes spread they betooke themselues to flight, leauing Scotland on the West, and bending toward Norway; il aduised (but that necessity vrged, & God had infatuated their counsells) to put their shaken and battered bottomes into those blacke and dangerous Seas; neither was the Climate healthfull for the crazed bodies of the Spaniards, ouer-beaten and tyred with wants, being now entred the degree of Latitude. 57. from whence the Lord Admirall returned, leauing some Scouts to descry their successe.

August 2.

The Spanish consultation.

(217) The Spaniards now cleared from those their haunting spirits, consulted most seriously what was to be done: the Popes credite was to bee respected, who had predicted this voyage to fortunate successe; the wrath of King Philip was to be feared, his great expenses thus lost; the aduenturors loosors if the voyage should bee left; the glory of the Spaniards laid in the suds, the Inuincible Nauy in the ebbe of her fame: and England still England, not lorded by the Spaniard, if they thus without further attempt should returne into Spaine. But withall, fiue thousand of their souldiers were slaine; multitudes of sicke and maimed lay on their hands; twelue of their greatest ships were sunke, lost, and taken; their Cables, Masts and Sailes, cut, rent, and broken, with the English shot, their ankers left, where the fired Hulkes forced them, their victuals failing, and fresh-water all spent, their enemies no lesse fierce and vndauntable, then fortunate: and their long expected friend, the Duke of Parma, though euer preparing, yet still forestalled by the Dutch, most firme Allies vnto the Queene: these circumstances wisely ballanced, the voice went currant for speeding into Spaine.

The Spaniards cast their horses into the sea.

(218) But knowing that Scotland (whose Religious King was fast-knit in affection, and blood vnto Queene Elizabeth) would yeeld them no comfort, and hopelesse also that Norway would giue them any supply, they cast all their Mules and Horses ouer-boord for sparing of their fresh-water: then framing their course to saile about Cathenes and the coasts of Ireland, so proceeded betweene the Orcades and Isles of Farr vnto the 61. degree Northward; whence the Duke of Medina, with his best stored shippes tooke Westward ouer the maine Ocean towards Biscay, and so arriued safely in Spaine, where for his Welcome, hee was deposed from all his authority, forbidden to come at the Court, and commanded to be priuate. Neither could hee thus giue satisfaction for his bad successes, albeit he imputed it to the treachery of his mariners, their ignorance, and small experience of those Northern Seas, the want of succors from the Prince of Parma, the tempests, shipwrackes, and ill fortune, but not a word of the iudgements of God vpon this Gyantlike attempt to enslaue all England to the mountaines of Grenada, or to the mines of Peru.

The Duke of Medina disgraced for his successe seruice.

(219) The residue of his ships, about forty in number, fell neerer with the coast of Ireland, intending for Cape Clare, where they well hoped to water; but the windes contrary, and tempests storming vpon those dangerous Seas, many of their ships perished vpon the shoares of Ireland, and among other a great Galliasse, wherein Michael de Oquendo was a commander, and two other of Venice, both ships of great burthen, besides thirty eight more, together with most of the Spaniards conteined within them. Those that got cleare of the danger, put forth to Sea, whereof some with a strong West winde were driuen into the chanell of England, where part of them were taken by the English, others by men of Rochel in France, and some arriued at Newhauen in Normandy. In so much, that of one hundred thirty foure ships, which had set saile out of Lisbone, onely fifty three returned to Spaine: of the foure Galliasses of Naples, but one: of the foure Gallies of Portugall, but one: and of the ninety one Gallions, and great Hulkes from diuers Prouinces, only thirty three returned, fifty eight beeing lost: in briefe, there were missing of their whole fleet foure-score and one vessels, and of the thirty thousand souldiers, thirteene thousand, fiue hundred and odde. Of prisoners taken in England, Ireland and the Low-Countries were two thousand and more. In England, Don Pedro de Valdez, Don Vasquez de Sylua, and Don Alonzo de Sayes and others were kept for their ransome: in Zeland, Don Diego de Piementell, and in Ireland, Don Alonzo de Lucon, Roderigo de Lasso and others of great account: to conclude, there was no famous or worthy family in all Spaine, which in this expedition lost not a sonne, a brother, or a kinsman.

The sum of the Spaniards losse.

(220) Thus were these Sea-seruices effected: as for the Land, preparations were made throughout the Kingdome, but the maine forces lying encamped at Tilbury vnder the command of the Earle of Leicester, thither her Maiesty in person vpon the ninth of August repaired, full of Princely resolution, and more then feminine courage, whose louely presence and imperiall speeches, as shee passed like some Amazonian Empresse through all her Army, were so acceptable and gratious, that Her souldiers, full-fraught with manly spirit, yet receiued an accesse of hardinesse from so alacrious a patterne in their Mayden Queene: and both they perceiued so well the loue of their Prince, and shee saw what it was to haue the loue of her subiects, that the harmony of both their affections was admirable, both of them professing resolution, and willing to sacrifice their liues in that most rightfull quarrel. But the God of Hosts hauing now preuented their forwardnesse, without losse of English bloud, eft-soones the Campe was dissolued: and not long after Leicester ended his daies, hauing beene a Peere of great estate, but lyable to the common destiny of most Great-ones, whom all men magnifie in their life time, but few speake well of after their death.

Earle of Leicesters death.

(221) The Land thus deliuered by the arme of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put back that sought to lay Englands faire vine-yard waste, Queene Elizabeth (who euer held ingratitude a Capitall sinne, but especially towards her Almighty protectour) commanded solemne Thankes-giuing to bee celebrated vnto the Lord God of Hosts, at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paules in Her chiefe City of London, which which accordingly was done vpon Sunday the eight of September, where eleuen of the Spanish Ensignes (the once badges of their bravery, but now of their vanity) were hung vpon the lower battlements of that Church, as palmes of praise for Englands deliverance; a shew no doubt more acceptable to God, then when their spread colours did set out the pride of their shippes, threatning the bloud of so many innocent and faithfull Christians.

(222) The next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, these faire flagges were spread vpon London-Bridge to the great ioy of the beholders, and eternall memory of Spanish purposes, as irreligious as vnprosperous. But the solemne day assigned to be kept holy throghout the land, was the nineteenth of November being Tuesday, which accordingly was then done, and would to God had so continued stil, being no lesse for our deliverance, then was that Purim for the Iewes, which they instituted to be kept holy throughout their generations.

Hest. 9. 26.

(223) Queene Elizabeth therefore, to bee her selfe an example vnto others, vpon the Sunday following, being the foure and twentieth of Nouember, repayred from the Pallace of White-Hall in Westminster, through the streetes of London in great Estate: and came accompanied with her Nobilitie vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where dismounting from her Chariot at the West-dore, shee humbled her selfe vpon her knees, and with great deuotion audibly praised God, acknowledging him her onely Defendor, who had thus deliuered the land from the rage of the enemy. And after the Sermon ended, wherein none other Argument was handled, but onely of prayse and glory to bee rendred vnto God; her Maiesty herselfe with most princely and Christian speeches exhorted all the people to their due performance of those religious seruices of thankefulnesse vnto God, like vnto another Iosuah, David, and Iosias. The Zelanders also to leaue a Memoriall of their no lesse gratitude to God, then faithfulnesse to the Queene, caused a new Coyne of siluer to bee stamped, hauing on the one side the Armes of their Country engrauen, with this Inscription, Glory to God alone, and on the other side, the portracts of great ships, vnder-stiled, The Spanish Fleet, and in the circumference, It came, went, and was. Anno 1588. Wherein they alluded to that quicke worke of Cæsar, * Veni, vidi, vici, which wee haue seene also excellently described in deuise, where on the one side, the Spanish Fleet had inscribed veni, the Sunne (the eye of the whole world) vidi, and the English Navy, vici. In other coines also were stamped ships fleeting, & sinking, and in the reuerse, Supplicants vpon their knees, with this Motto, Man proposeth, God disposeth. 1588. To the like effect also the Hollanders stamped the remembrance of this Armado in their monies, after the example of the Ancient, whose vse was to inscribe their victories vpon their Coines, of which kind were those with Spanish Shippes, hauing this Word, Impius fugit nemine sequente.

The Zelanders thankefulnes to God.

I came, I saw, I conquered.

(225) Neither did the Dutch alone participate the triumph of this glorious successe, but all other Nations also congratulated the same; which vniuersall ioy being excellently expressed in this ensuing Ode, by a * Stranger of eminent Pietie and Learning, and translated into all the chiefe Languages of Christendome; we will here annexe the same, as the Close and Epilogue of this Tragico-Comedy, to bee perpetuated vnto all ensuing posterities.

(226) The thunderclappe of this Spanish Armado thus past, and the inuincible vanquished, as the attempt & Issue was open to the eyes of the world; so the due consideration thereof was rooted in all true English hearts; whereupon the Nobles and Commonalty being then assembled for Parliament, this course was at length thought fittest, that the proud Castilian should bee required vpon his owne coasts: And first it was determined to aide Don Antonio the expulsed King of Portugall, whose title was apparantly farre more iust, then either Philips for England, or Stukeleys for Ireland; both which Kingdoms they had in hostile manner inuaded: and this the rather was resolued on, for that the Spanish king was endeauouring to repaire his dishonour by repairing his Fleet and Forces for a new expedition against England.

Consultations for attempts on Spaine.

Don Antonio king of Portugall flyeth to Queen Elizabeths protection.

Philip prepareth for a new expedition.

(227) This Don Antonio among other Competitors claimed the Crowne of Portugall after the decease of King Henry, as sprung from King Emanuel by his sonne Don Lewis the Infant; but alleadged by the Philippians to haue been his Bastard. Against which accusation Don Antonio had sentence for his legitimation by the Bishoppe of Angra, and euery way sought to rubbe off that scandalous imputation. His conditions were such as well befitted a Crowne, he being a Prince of greater spirit then person, and yet of rare modesty and humility, seasoned with a disposition very deuout and religious, whereby hee came to bee in farre better fauour and esteeme then Philip of Spaine; for which cause hee was first made Defender of the Realme by the Gouernours, and afterwards accepted King by the people, whereto he was in a manner enforced, seeing himselfe enuironed with many drawn swords in midst of a furious multitude.

Don Antonio his Title.

His conditions.

(228) But Philip as more ambitious, so more strong in men and munition, made warre into Portugall, and by his Generall, Duke Alba, put this new King vnto flight; after which fortune, himself enters Portugall, where hee proclaimed eight hundred thousand Crownes to him that could bring him Don Antonio either alive or dead. But such was their loue vnto this vnfortunate Prince, that eight monethes hee kept in Portugall disguised, and had conuersation and conference with many, yet was neuer betraied; but not able to hold vp his side, the Gouernors (as is the fashion of the world) dayly falling to his stronger, after many conflicts, and much lamenting their miserable estate, left the Spaniard (who then gaped for nothing but Kingdomes) to possesse the Gouernment of Portugall.

K. Philip attempts the Crowne of Portugall.

Portugall possessed by the Spaniard.

(229) Antonio's kingly stile thus ended, before it was throughly begunne; Philip had subiections offered him anew; and in such sort, as some that seemed Competitors, yeelded him their rights, among whom Katherine Duchesse of Braganza was one, yea and Pope Gregorie himselfe, who had hitherto sided with Don Antonio, the Prior of Crato, knowing it was surest to hold with the strongest, sent Philip his Apostolicall allowance, the better to put on his Newgotten Crowne; exhorting him to thankefulnesse, for these his prosperities, and moving him earnestly to make warre against England, with proffers of assistance as we haue said.

King Antonio seekes aid from France.

(230) Don Antonio thus driuen out of his Kingdome, for succour repaired vnto the Court of France; where, of the Queene Mother, a pretended Competitor for the Portugall Crowne, he was both fauoured and aided at Seas for the Isles of Terceres:

His losses at sea.

but such was his destiny in his Sea-fights also (the Peruan gold being no lesse powerful then the Spanish Canons) that eight of the tallest French Ships were lost, & two thousand men slaine; among whom was the Lord Philip Trosy the Generall, whose death was so taken, and the expedition so censured, as the Portugall Captaines were reputed for Cowards, imprisoned in France, and many of them charged with corruption and treason; so that all his hopes were now in the wane, and no further assistance could bee expected of the French.

K. Antonio repaires for aide to Q. Elizabeth.

(231) The pore Prince thus deiected in France, knowing the vniuersall report of Queene Elizabeths great fame, obtained leaue of her Maiesty for accesse vnto her sacred presence, whose Court had euer been a famoused Sanctuary to all oppressed Princes, or distressed Estates: where shewing his right to the Portugall Crowne, and clearing the obiections touching his Bastardy (which imputation in sundry languages hee refuted in Print to the publike view of the world) receiued now comfort to bee set in his Kingdome, England hauing so iust an occasion to warre against Spaine. Among whom once more he assayed to trie the fauour of Fortune; his Petition to the Queene being onely this, that she would but land him safe in his Country, and amongst his own People, of whose assured loue and readinesse to receiue him as their King, and thence forward to defend him and his iust Title, hee nothing doubted. So honest and reasonable a suit could not but finde fauour with so gracious a Queene: whereupon prouision being made for the Portugall voyage, he embarked at Plimouth in Aprill, whence sixe of the Queenes shippes, and twenty more of warre (besides many other ordained for transportation) spread their Sailes vnder the conduct of the euer-feared Sir Francis Drake, and the most valorous Sir Iohn Norrit Generall for the land seruice, with eleuen thousand soldiers, and twenty fiue hundred Mariners. These *landing in a Bay of Galicia, neere vnto the Groine, in their March were met and encountred within halfe a mile of the Towne, but their enemies were soone forced to retire vnto their Gates.

Succours are afforded him.

A.D. 1589
The Portugall voyage.

Ant. Winkfeild.
*April 20.

(232) The next day General Norris hauing viewed the aduantage, resolued to attempt the place by a scalado, and to land some Artillery, to beate the ships and Gallies which did play vpon their troopes, which was effectually performed; and the Gallies forced to abandon the Roade, the Base-Town was surprized, and in three seuerall places entred, where the Inhabitants with a great cry tooke into the high Towne, but some preuented, escaping the fury of the sword fledde to the Rockes, where they were found and slaine to the number of fiue hundred. Among these so hid, Don Iuan de Luna, a man of great command, was one, who the next morning came forth, and yeelded himselfe to the Generals deuotion; Iuan de Vera, a Commissary of victuals, was likewise taken, who confessed that there was in the Towne three hundred thousand Ducats of siluer, and order giuen for the baking of three hundred thousand of Bisket, that the Towne was stored with two thousand Pipes of wine, a thousand Iarres of Oyle, three thousand Kintals of Beefe, a great quantitie of Beanes, Pease, Wheat and Fish, and of Match and Harqueboizes three Barkes were brought thither not long before. All which (thee confessed) were for a new voyage against England. And indeed such store of wines was there found, as the English Souldiers vsing little moderation in drinking, did not onely lay themselues open to danger from the vpper Towne, but by distemperature so inflamed and infected their blood, that it caused a greate mortality and infection in the whole Army.

The Groine surprised. Infection through intemperate drinking of wine.

(233) The Base-Towne thus gotten, a sudden rescue of two thousand men so resolutely came to the very Gates, as though no contrary power could possibly keepe them from entrance, but in the first brunt of resistance, they were content to make their heeles the safe-guardians of their heades, of whose yet many were cut short by the English pursuers. With the like feare the shippes in the Roade were fraught, whose Souldiers ouercharging the great Ordinance of a great Gallion, abandoned her bord, and set her on fire, which for the space of two daies burned in most terrible wise, so that of fifty great peeces but sixteene were found whole, the rest broken and melted, and so brought away by the English; but the higher towne strong both by situation and sufficiency for resistance, resolutely held out, onely intreated by Parley to haue faire Warres. And being built for the most part on a hard rocke, one place was found mineable, where the Generall the fourth day of this siege set men on worke, who bedded their powder somwhat too short of the wal, wherby that designe tooke not the supposed effect. But this error reduced, another as great was committed, for the Miners againe set on worke, came right vnder the Wall, but somwhat wide of a great Tower thereupon built, so that when the blast of powder brake forth, it ouerthrew but a part of the same, and left the other standing tottering and shaken, which being not regarded in the heat of assault, fell suddenly vpon the English, and slew Captaine Sydenham with thirty Souldiers besides, to the great astonishment of the rest there employed, not knowing the cause whereof it came, but rather suspecting it a Strategeme of the Towne; and the rest of the rubbish lay so loose vnder foot, that the Assaulters could haue no sure standing to make their fight.

The Enemie put to flight.

(234) Whiles these things were in doing, the Generall had certaine notice that the Conde de Andrada had assembled an Army of eight thousand strong, which was but the beginning of another more strong, leuied vnder the Conde de Altemira; the former, not passing sixe miles off, and both of them intending the rescue of the Groine: To preuent which, Sir Iohn Norris with nine Regiments *met them, and presently fell to a hote skirmish, whose brunt the enemy not able to endure, tooke ouer a Bridge, built vpon a Creeke of the Sea, at the further foot whereof their Campe lay very strongly entrenched. Sir Edward Norris, Colonell Sydney, the Captaines Hinder, Fulford, and Barton entred the Bridge, whose further end was barricaded with Barrels, where comming to push of pike and sword, Sir Edward was grieuously hurt in the head, Captaine Hinder receiued fiue wounds in the heade and face by the Sword; Captaine Fulford hurt in the left arme with a shot, and Captaine Barton hurt in the eye. Notwithstanding, the Generall so seconded the encounter as the Guard was ouerthrowne, and the whole Army put into route, of whom our men had the Chase fully three miles in foure sundry wayes. What the slaughter was, is vncertaine, but supposed to bee great; besides others that were found hid in Vineyeards and hedges, and two hundred put to sword that had taken into a Cloister. In this seruice the Kings Standard was taken, some plate and rich apparell found in their Campe, and the Country for three Miles compasse set on flaming fire; the Generall making his retreat with the Kings Colours and Armes displayed before him, to the great honour of the English.

The enemy encountred. *May 6

The English victorious.

(235) Thus

(235) Thus returning vnto the Groine, and wanting Cannons to batter the walles, the English fired the Base-Towne, embarked from thence, and put againe to Sea. But the windes being contrary, many assaies were made before the Fleet could recouer the Burlings; in which passage Robert Earle of Essex with M. Walter Deuereux his brother, accompanied with others, came to the Fleet, which Earle hauing put himselfe into the iourney against the opinion of the world, or well-liking of the Queene, seemed vnto the Sager sort to hazard his fortunes; but other more stirring spirits, held it the great aduancement of his reputation; whereof I thinke I may say, as Tacitus said of Vespasians employment in Britaine, That there was laide the first foundation of his future esteeme.

The Earle of Essex commeth to the Fleet. May 13.

Tacitus.

(236) The Fleete thus encreased, they landed in Portugall, euen vnder shot of the Castle of Peniche, where the Sea growing high, many were in perill of drowning; for most of them waded to the waste for the Shoare. Of this Towne and Peece, Conde de Fuentes had the command; who with fiue Companies of Spaniards sallied out against the English, and made their approach close to the Sea-side; whereupon the Earle of Essex with Sir Roger Williams diuided their men into two Troupes, the one keeping the Sands along the Shoare, and the other ouer the sand-hilles made towards the in-land. Which the enemy seeing, hasted to the encounter, and came vnto fight, euen within push of Pike; but were so entertained, as they had no great liking, but presently turned their backes, and fled further then the English had reason to follow. The Towne they left vndefended, so that it was entred without any resistance, and the Castle summoned the same night, the Captaine whereof was Antonio de Aurid, a Portugall, who demanding, and being satisfied, that Don Antonio was present, gaue vp the peece, with the munition therein. Vnto this place some Fryers & other poore of the Country, came to welcome their King, promising him (in the name of the rest) a sufficient supply both of horse and foot, which notwithstanding was neuer performed.

The enemy put to flight.

Peniche in Portugall taken.

(237) Here it was thought fitte that the wounded and sicke should remaine, with sufficient prouision, and seuen companies of foot to guard the ships and Castle; and the maine Army to march ouer land vnto Lisbon, the Metropolitane of Portugall, accounted the strongest Fort in the World, and whosoeuer held that, might (in their esteeme) make head against the mightiest Monarch in the Earth; whither likewise Sir Francis Drake (Generall of the Sea-seruice) promised to come, if the iniury of weather did not hinder him. The March vndertaken, Torres Vedras made some shew of resistance, but presently vpon the approch of the English, that Castell was abandoned, and left to the possession of Don Antonio; whose hopes hereupon beganne to enlarge, thinking the whole would stand for his claime; but therein was not a little deceiued; for victuals growing scarse in the Army, the Country did not supply them according to expectation, neither came in any of strength. Notwithstanding the English Army from Vedras marched to San Sebastian, thence to Lores, and lodged the fift day at Alualana, three miles from Lisbon, where many of their Souldiers perished by drinking in two places of poisoned standing waters, as also in eating of honey, purposely left in the houses, and spiced with poison, as it was thought.

The attempt for Lisborne.

Spanish history.

(238) The fiue and twentieth of May, the English Army came vnto Lisbon, whose Suburbes were found abandoned, houses of prouision for corne & victuals fired, and none left to defend but a sort of olde folkes and beggars, crying in the streetes, Viua el Rey Don Antonio; and about midnight they within the Towne set fire on their houses that stood within vpon the wall. The English wearied with the six dais march, want of victual, the last nights watch, and many of them weake, were desirous of rest; whereof the enemy hauing aduertisement, in the dead of the night sallied out of the Town, and made their assault in three seuerall streetes, but chiefly vpon Colonell Brets Quarters, who being at rest (as most of the Army were) with what hast was possible, put himselfe, and his in Armes, & so throughly made head, that hee was slaine in the place; Captaine Carre with the like resistance and valour ended his life; Captaine Carsey wounded to death; Captaine Caue hurt, but not mortally. The others found not their attempts so easie, but were put to a suddaine and foule retreate; insomuch as the Earle of Essex (full of high spirite, and hote youthly bloud) had them in chase to the very gates of the high town: and (as it was truly reported) the enemies losse did triple the English, aswell in quantity, as in men of quality.

A Sally on the Englishe.

Essex pursueth the enemy to the very Gates.

(239) Mean while Generall Drake with his whole Fleete was come to Cascais, and possessed the towne without any resistance, for the inhabitants at the discouery of his Nauie, fledde with bagge and baggage into the mountaines, which the Generall perceiuing, sent vnto them a Portugall Pilote, to offer them all peaceable kindnesse, so as they would accept of their rightfull King, and minister necessaries to the Army which hee had brought. Which offer they ioyfully embraced, and presently sent two chiefe men of the Towne, to signifie their loyaltie to Don Antonio, and their honest affection to his Army, whereupon Sir Francis immediately landed his Companies, but not without perill of the Castell, which being guarded by the Spaniards, held out against him for their King.

Drake surpriseth Cascais.

(240) At Lisbone the Portugals had promised to aid Antonio with three thousand horse, besides other supplies from the Duke of Braganza, Don Francisco de Toledo, and others, at a day prefixed, and now altogether past, by reason (as it seemeth) that the Spaniards hauing chiefe command in all places, they were vnable by any meanes to make head. Whereupon the vnfortunate Antonio seeing the time expired, & but forty horse come, nor of foot sufficient to furnish two Ensignes, grew almost hopelesse, yet assaied hee to perswade a stay before Lisbon for 9. dayes more: but the Towne being strong, and the English declining (for there was the first apparant shew of sickneesse among them) the Portugals backward, and of base resolutions, ready to obey any so themselues may be rich: and the Generall hauing already done more then was promised, left they should hazard the honour which hitherto had beene gotte, denied his request, and gaue present order to return to Cascais; himselfe, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams remaining with the stand, that was made in the high street, till the whole Army was drawn into the field: at which time, the King (euen herein of kingly disposition towards his Natiues) made request to saue the Suburbes from spoile, which if the English had ransacked, they had beene the richest Armie that euer returned to England. But now ready to depart Lisbon, the noble Essex in the courage of his Martiall bloud, ranne his speare and brake it against the Gates of that City: demanding alowde, if any Spaniard mewed therein, durst aduenture forth in fauour of his Mistresse to break a staffe with him. But those Gallants thought it safer to court their Ladies with amorous discourses, then to haue their loues written on their breasts with the point of his English Speare.

Don Antonio his princely compassion.

(241) Being now come to Cascais, intelligence was brought by a Fryer, that the enemy was marched vnto Saint Iulian with a strong power to encounter the English, vnto whose Generall, the Generall Norris sent a Trumpet, promising to meete him the next morning if hee durst abide his comming, and withall gaue him the lie: the Earle of Essex also sent him a particular Cartell, offering himselfe against any of theirs, if they had any of his qualitie, or else fiue, eight or tenne, to trie single combate, wher-

at this Spaniards combe was so cut, as in the night, before battell, in great feare and perturbation hee dislodged, and returned to Lisbon, not answering the Challenge, but threatning to hang the Messenger, who followed him euen to the very Gate. Then was the Castle of Cascais rendred vpon condition, that the men of Armes should depart with bag and baggage; which Peece in part, by the Order of the Generall, was blowne vp by mine. During which time threescore Hulkes laden with Corne, Masts, Cables, Copper, and Waxe, beeing the Spanish Kings prouision were taken going to Lisbon.

The Castle of Cascais rendred.

Sixty Spanish Hulkes taken.

(242) The English hauing thus farre proceeded, put againe to Sea, when, vnlooked for, and in a great calme, nine Gallies fell in the winde of their Fleete, and so plaied vpon a stragling Barke of Plimouth, that Captaine Calwerley, his Lieutenant, the Master, and some of the Mariners, abandoning the vessell, betooke them to their Boates, whereof one, (in which the Captaine and Master were) was ouerrunne by the Gallies, and they both drowned. Two other Hulkes also stragling from the Fleete, were set vpon by the Spaniards; in one of which, Captaine Minshaw fought to the last, and very valiantly after his ship was on fire; but whether fired by himselfe or the enemy, could not be iudged; the calme being so still, as no succour could bee sent from the fleete, to their great griefe.

(243) Thus continuing seuenteene daies on board, many of the dead Souldiers were cast into the Sea; and the whole now consisted of two thousand men, who comming to Vigo, found euery streete fenced with a strong Barricadoe, and but only one man in the Towne, the Inhabitants making toward Bayon as fast as they could driue; then was both the Town and all the Country for seuen miles compasse set on a flame. Which seruice thus performed, Sir Francis Drake with the Queenes ships safely * arriued at Plimouth, and vpon the second of Iuly following arriued Sir Iohn Norris, hauing both of them performed the parts of worthy Generals.

The English arriued at Plymouth. * Iune 21.

Iohn Serres. The State of France.

(244) Whilst these Realms were at variance each against others, the French were not quiet among themselues, the King somewhat voluptuous, but excessiuely prodigall towards his fauorites; the Nobility ambitious, mistrustfull, and disloyall; the Clergy turbulent, and vndutiful, bending all their force and thoughts against the plantation of the truth. To vnite friendship therefore some league had beene made, for confirmation whereof the three Estates were assembled at Bloys. For the Clergy appeared one hundred thirty foure deputies, among whom were foure Arch-bishops, one and twenty Bishops, and two Generals of Orders; for the Nobility came one hundred and foure score gentlemen; and for the third Estate an hundred foure score and eleuen Deputies, all of them Lawyers and Merchants. Vpon the first sitting, and before these best wits of France, King * Henry made a solemne Oration to perswade vnion, full of liuely affection, true magnanimity, and pregnant reasons, deliuered with such an admirable eloquence and grace, as it rauished the eares of all present, besides the opening of the propositions; the which, Mantelon, the keeper of the Seale, for him further prosecuted; after him Reynauld de Beaulme, Archbishop of Bourges, Patriarke and primate of Aquitaine, spake in the same argument; and lastly, Michell Marteau, Prouost and President for the third Estate, confirmed, and consented to all that had beene said. Whereupon an oth of Vnion was taken, to binde the King, them, and all their posterities, the fundamental Lawes and liberties of France onely reserued.

* Henry 3.

An oth of Vnion in France.

(245) This notwithstanding, the Leaguers, to hit the marke whereat they aimed, daily diuulged and buzzed the French Kings disgraces, and al to install the Guize in his Throne; the Papists wrongs were greeuously expostulated, their Churches burnt, and Altars profaned; the people oppressed with impositions and subsidies; places of Iudgement set to sale; and spirituall benefices to him that would giue most; the offices at Court, they alleaged, were managed by men of meane ranke; the Noblemens seruices neglected and vnrewarded. All these, and more, were complained of, and all to make the King base in the peoples eye, the Guize himselfe the while temporizing with both, as disswading the King to subiect his authority vnto their complaints, and at the same present perswading the other, to bee vehement in their pursuites.

The Guizians practises.

(246) Among their other practises one was against the King of Navarre; whom the Clergy condemned for an Heretike, the chiefe (as they termed him) of the relapse, excommunicated and depriued him of the Gouernment of Guienne, and of all other dignities, as beeing vnworthy of successions of Crownes or Realmes. But Henry, with Festus thought it vnreasonable, to condemne this Prince without hearing, and therefore desired to haue him againe summoned, and againe to bee sworne to the Vnion.

A. D. 1588. Nouemb. 4.

Acts 25.

(247) To this motion was answered, that the Cardinal of Bourbon his vncle had once obtained absolution for him; that the Queene mother had many times assaied to winne him; many learned doctors had been sent to reclaime him: but all in vaine. For, from the Cradle (said they) hee hath beene brought vp in this new Heresie, hath beene condemned by the Councell of Trent, receiued againe into grace by the Consistory, is againe fallen into the error which hee abiured, and is now an Heretike, relapsed, vnworthy of obedience, vnworthy of respect, and vnworthy to bee praied for: for the holy See of Rome hath declared him a Schismatike, excommunicated him as incapable of succession, and therefore must the Estates of France ratifie the Popes sentence; and King Henry must thereunto subscribe; if not, the Duke of Guize, who was Master of the Castle; and carried the keyes at his owne girdle, would dissolue the assembly and lay all the blame vpon his Maiesty.

(248) Thus then (by the purpose of man) the first Prince of the bloud, and the onely remainder, after so many sisters and cousens of Anion, Alencon, Eureux, Berry, Bourgoyne, Angolesme and Orleans, and which only succeeded that of Valois, was now depriued of the succession which Nature gaue him, without calling, or hearing of his iustifications.

Henry King of Navarre pronounced incapable of the Crown of France.

(249) To further this Guizian enterprize, his followers buzd into the heads of the multitude, that it was the Kings Climacterical yeere, and so many presumptions were obserued, as it was told the King in plaine tearmes that the Duke of Guize would surprize him. Whereupon, hauing remained long in suspence, betwixt the rigour of reuenge, and the mildnesse of his owne disposition, at last, by the lightening, supposing a thunder-clap would follow, he sought timely to preuent the danger, by taking away his life, that intended the blow. Which was not so secretly carried, but that the designe was discouered, and a scrowle laied vnder Guize his Napkin as he sate at dinner, wherein it was written, that his life was in danger: but hee, as one confident in his owne power, wrote in the same scrowle, these words, they dare not; and threw it from him vnder the Table. Other aduertisements hee had (if wee may beleeue the additions of Serres) from Rome, Spaine, Lorraine, and Sauoy, that a bloudy Catastrophe should dissolue this assembly, their Almanakes had obserued it, and it was generally predicted for Saint Thomas day.

(250) But the Duke bearing himselfe bolde vpon his owne greatnesse, neglected all motiues, and very presumptuously spake to the King, complayning that the affaires of France inclined from bad vnto worse, vncurable, and almost growne desperate, wherefore, the charge hee had receiued, hee would againe giue vp, and retired in the Country, least least other mens sinnes should be reputed his.

(251) The King, who had resolued on his death, gaue him good words, with promise of amendment what in him lay, and held him with familiar discourses, and fauourable countenance, vntill a fitte time should bee offered; which was the three and twentieth of December, when the Lords sitting in Councell, and entring consultation, the Guise was called for vnto the King, who as hee lifted vp the Tapestrie into his Cabinet, was charged vpon by the Guard, and with their swords and partisans presently slaine; the King auouching, that thenceforth he would rule alone. And not long after the Cardinall of Guise, the Duke dranke of the same cup at the commandement of the King.

(252) This death of the Guize & Cardinall, caused the King to bee exceedingly hated of the Papals, whose Preachers banded his reproches in their Pulpits, incensing the people to open rebellion, and as Furies of hell heaped an Iliade of curses vpon the heades of the Executioners. In Paris the Kings furniture, and in the Lowre his pictures were broken, his Armes beaten down, his Images dragged throgh the streetes, his great Seale defaced, and his royall name blurred with many opprobrious tearmes. Yea and the Colledge of Sorbon as forward as any, concluded by a publike Act, That the people of France were free from the Oath of Obedience and Fealty which they stood ingaged in vnto Henry of Valois, that lawfully, and with a good conscience they might arme themselues against him, receiue his reuenewes, and imploy it in their warres for his ouerthrow.

(253) Contrariwise the Duke of Guize was extolled to heauen, Orations made of his commendable exploits in Hungary against the Turkes, at Iarnac against the Protestants, at Poitiers, at Montcontour, at Vimorry, and at other places; in a word, such were the intestine troubles of France, as the king sent for Henry King of Nauarre to helpe quench the flames of ciuill sedition, which were mounted so high, as that the Leaguers preuailed against the Lords of Parliament, prophaned Churches, violated Virgines, and defiled their Christian profession with streames of bloud. And to fill vp the measure of their impious iniquity, a Iacobin Frier, by name Iames Clement, when the King had besieged Paris (the head City of this rebellion) made vowes to kill the Tyrant (as hee tearmed him) to free that holy City from Senacherib's siege; with which resolution hee went to Doctor Bourgoine Priour of his Couent, and imparted this damnable proiect to him, to Father Commolet, to other Iesuites, and to the heades of the League, all of them incouraging him to this Diuelish designe, with promise of Abbeyes and Bishoprickes if hee escaped, and if he died in the action to be made a Martyr, and haue place in heauen aboue the Apostles.

(254) Thus furnished with blessings for this cursed act, vpon the first of August the Monke went to Paris, and had priuate accesse to the King to deliuer a letter, pretending some matter of importance; but as the King read it, the Diabolicall Instrument with a knife from his sleeue, wounded him in the bottome of his belly, and there left the knife, which the King drew forth, and with the same struck this Iacobine aboue the eye: their strugling being heard, many hastily came in, who seeing the King wounded, and all in gore bloud, in their rage stabbed the Monster to death, and not many dayes after, K. Henry died of the wound.

(255) Whereupon Charles Cardinall of Bourbon a younger brother to Anthony King of Nauarre, and vncle vnto Henry then the present King, was proclamed Lieutenant Gouernor, yea and gold and siluer coined with his picture and stile of Charles the tenth King of France. Howbeit Henry King of Nauarre was proclaimed of the Army, whose right was before that Papall Prelates, and whom the last Henry by his last will ordained to bee his Successor. Notwithstanding onely in respect of his Religion, being a professed Protestant, the Leaguers made such head against him that hee was enforced to sue vnto that Generall Sanctuary of Princes, Queene Elizabeth for her aide, who euer fauouring the progresse of the Gospell, and knowing Nauarres claime to be aboue all other (of that Nation) for the French Crown, and that the Spaniard was setting foot into France first, sent him twenty thousand pound sterling, with powder, munition for warre, and certaine ships also to serue at his command; and causing a generall muster to be taken in most of the Shires in England, sent foure thousand souldiers furnished, from euery of them into France, to which seruice the Citizens of London set forth a thousand very well appointed and seruiceable men: the Generall of all which forces, was the noble Peregrine Barton Lord Willoughby: whose want she again supplied with three thousand foot, which were sent into Britaine, vnder the conduction of Sir Iohn Norris, that sonne of Mars: these ioyning with the Prince Dombet Lord Generall of that Prouince, performed many worthy exploits for the French King.

(256) But Parma being entred France, and the *Pope with his Cardinals fulminating his Excommunication against Henry and his adherents: Queen Elizabeth (who neuer was daunted with such flashes) sent into France Robert Earle of Essex, for her Lieutenant Generall ouer foure thousand footmen, and two hundred horse, (besides many Pioners) all of them to bandy for the King against his enemies the Leaguers. The Earle, though yong, yet full of valour, was followed with many voluntarie Gentlemen, whose countenances well shewed the courage of their hearts: These landing in Normandy, laide siege vnto the strong Roan, in assault whereof his brother Walter Deuereux was slaine with a small shot, to the excessiue griefe of the Earle, and others, being a Gentleman trained vp, both by Academicall and Marshall education, vnto very great hopes and expectation.

(257) But King Henry finding many rubs in his way, the Leaguers still increasing their strengthes from Rome and Spaine, and the Crowne of France laid at stake for him that threw most, thought it good policy (though proued to him in the end disasterous and fatall) to temporize with the predominating faction; and therefore leauing the Religion wherein he had been bred, fell to that of Rome which euer till then hee had resisted, and after great suit made to the Pope, was lastly absolued by the Holy Father, who heaped whole streames of blessings vpon his sacred head, himselfe swearing to defend the Romish faith against all impugners: so that now all sides satisfied, without contradiction; Henry of Nauarre was crowned King of France. Onely the Spaniards were vnwilling to leaue that faire Country; fortified in Britaine vpon the Riuer, ouer against Brest; whence after much slaughter, General Norris forced them, though with the losse of some English, & life of Captain Furbisher commander of the Fleet.

A.D. 1593. Iuly 25.

(258) The Leaguers not liking Nauarres aduancement, mistrusting that his conuersion was fained, and temporary, as being but a steppe, the easier to mount the royall throne: by treason laide wait for his life, and croft what they could his countenance at Rome; whilest the Spaniards imployed all their wits for the worrying of France, and so farre persisted in their designes, as King Henry by proclamation denounced warre against Spaine, and Philip in like manner proclaimes warre against France; in which state they stood, during the life of Ernestus Arch-duke of Austria, brother in law and Nephew vnto King Philip, whose Gouernour hee then was in the Low-Countries.

the French and Vnited Estates; and to make his assayes, hee first beganne with Callis, a thing long before proiected by others in his place; that Towne being a Sea-port of great importance, as the English found it whilst it was theirs, and the losse thereof great, as Queene Mary and her wise Statists both tooke it, and felt it.

(260) At this time the Garrison was small, and the Gouernour negligent, vndiscreet, and vnfortunate, though hauing notice from Netherland that the Spaniard meant her siege; so that Richbanke left vnmanned, and in great ruine, was entred vpon by the Cardinall, and such as resisted driuen into the Towne; where, with the Inhabitants hee grew to a composition for the surrender, Vysdossein the Gouernour neuer interposing therein.

Queen Elizabeth offereth aid to recouer Callis.

(261) Callis thus turning Spanish, and the Spaniards still intending for England, Elizabeth solicited the French king, & proffered her aid for recouery of that Peece; but hee empouerished by warre, sought to regaine his losses rather by some faire conditions of peace, then to depend vpon the dependencies & hazard of Armies; at which resolution our Noble Senobia was nothing well pleased, and therefore to preuent the practises of Spaine, began to make good against them, and prepared another expedition to Sea. But dealing more prince-like then Philip had done by her (who made fairest pretence of peace, when hee was hotest in preparing warre) shee caused to bee published and printed a Declaration of the iust causes mouing her to set forth her Nauy for the defence of her Realme, the Tenor wherof we thinke not vnfit to bee here inserted.

The Declaration touching the setting forth of a Nauy.

(262) To all Christian people to whom this Declaration shall come to bee read or heard, greeting; Wee Robert Earle of Essex, and Ewe, Vicount Hereford, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Bourchier, and Louaine, &c. and Charles Lord Howard, Baron of Effingham, Lord High Admirall of England, &c. hauing the charge of a Royall Nauie of Shippes, prepared and sent to the Seas, by the most Excellent Princesse the Lady Elizabeth, Queene of England, France and Ireland, &c. doe giue all men knowledge that the said Nauie vnder our charge is by her Maiesty prepared, and sent to serue on the Seas, for defence of her Maesties Realmes, Dominions, and Subiects, against such mighty Forces as wee are aduertised from all partes of Christendome, to be already prepared by the King of Spaine, and by further prouisions of men and shippes daily sent for, are to bee mightily increased, to inuade her Maesties Realmes, as heretofore in the yeere of our Lord, 1588. was attempted (euen when there was a Treaty continued by both their Commissioners for a Peace) with a greater Army then euer before in his time was set to Seas: though by Gods goodnes and the valiance and wisdome of her Noble and faithfull Subiects, the same was notably made frustrate. And because her Maiesty hath good intelligence of perfect amity with all Kings and Princes of Christendome, sauing with the King of Spaine, who hath this many yeeres most vniustly professed openly great enmity by diuers actions, both against her royall person and her people, and countries, without any iust cause first giuen on her Maesties part: Therefore wee the said Earle, and Lord Admirall doe ascertaine all persons, that wee are most straitly cõmanded by her excellent Maiesty, to forbeare from offending in this our voyage of any manner of persons of what Nation soeuer, except the saide Kings Naturall Subiects, or such other borne Strangers, as shall giue to the said King manifest aide with men, shippes, artillery, victuall, and other warlike prouisions for inuasion of her Maiesty. Which her Maesties commandement we meane dutifully to obserue, and do therefore giue strait charge to all persons, that shall serue in this Nauy vnderneath vs, vpon pain of extreme punishment to obserue the same; yet to auoide all occasions that may breede question, who they are, being not the King of Spaines Subiects, that shal be charged by vs, to bee manifest aiders for the furnishing and strengthning of the said Kings Forces, prouided either by land or sea, to attempt any inuasion of her Maesties countries: Wee doe for the liquidation of this doubt, earnestly in Gods name, require and charge all persons, that are not the said Kings naturall Subiects, and yet that haue giuen him aide with their shippes, victuall and munition as is aboue said, to withdraw all their said ships prepared for the warre, and all their prouisions of hostilitie out of any Hauens of Spaine or Portugall, or from the company and seruice of the Kings shippes against our Nauy; and therewith to returne either to their owne Countries, or if they shall like to come to our Nauie, to whome, in the reuerend name of our Soueraign Lady the Queens Maiesty, wee doe promise all security, both for their persons and goods, to bee vsed and defended as friends, and to suffer all their Shippes and prouisions, that were taken by the King of Spaine, or intended for his seruice, or that shall be by the Owners withdrawne from his aide, to remaine in their free dispositions, so as the same bee vsed in all sorts as friends, and not as enemies to the Queenes Maiesty, and to vs her Generals: and if any shall vpon knowledge of this her Maesties most honourable Order, and of our promise (to obserue the same as fauourably as wee may) willingly and manifestly refuse to accept this our offer, and shall not endeuour themselues to performe this reasonable request, tending to their good and liberty; wee shall then bee iustly moued, as by the law of Armes wee may, to take and vse all such so refusing this our offer, as manifest aiders of the King of Spaine with forces to inuade her Maesties Dominions, and so manifest enemies: and in such case of that refusall, if any harme shall happen by any attempt against their Persons, Shippes and goods, by any our Nauie, for the aiding of the said King: there shall bee no iust cause for them hereafter to complaine, or to procure their Naturall Princes and Lords to sollicite restitutions or amends for the same. And for the more notification hereof, wee haue thought good to haue the Originall hereof to be signed with our hands, and with our Seales, to bee sent by any that will require to reade or see the same: And likewise wee haue put the same in Print, in French, Italian, Dutch and Spanish, and haue also caused the same to be distributed into as many Ports of Spaine and Portugall as conueniently might be, for the better knowledge to be had in the said Ports, as also in all other Portes vnder his subiection.

A Prayer made by Q. Elizabeth for the prospering of her Nauy.

Most omnipotent Maker, and Guider of the Worlds Masse, that onely searchest and fadomest the bottome of our hearts conceits, and in them seest the true Originals of all our actions intended: thou that by thy foresight doest truly discerne, how no malice of reuenge, nor quittance of iniurie, nor desire of blood-shed, nor greedinesse of lucre, hath bred the resolution of our new-set out Army, but a heedfull care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes, nor ouer-surety of hauen might breed either danger to vs, or glory to them: these being the grounds wherewith thou doest inspire the mind; wee humbly beseech thee with bended knees, prosper the worke, and with best forewinds guide the iourney, speed the victory, and make the returne the aduancement of thy glory, the triumph of their fame, and surety to the Realme, with the least losse of the English blood. To these deuout petitions Lord giue thou thy blessed Grant.

and Ewe in the Du-Repulse; both of them iointlie her Maiesties Lieutenants Generall for this seruice, by Sea and by land. The Vice-Admirall was the Lord Thomas Howard, shipped in the Mirmure, and the Rere-Admirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, in the Warre-Spite; and for the States was Admirall, Iem Van Duuenuoord, who serued in the Neptune, a Shippe of foure hundred Tunnes, and accordingly the whole Fleet was diuided into fiue squadrons, with a commandement that euery squadron should attend his Admirall, & euery one of these had his Vice-Admirall assigned. Of the first was Sir Robert Southwell in the Lion; of the second, Sir Francis Vere, in the Rainebow; the third Sir Robert Dudley attending the Lord Thomas Howard, in the Non-Pareile; the fourth, Robert Crosse following Sir Walter Rawleigh in the Swift-sure; and the last was, Iem Gerbrantson, Vice-Admirall of the Hollanders.

The Vice-Admirals

(265) For the Land-seruice besides the Generals, were Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marshall: Sir Iohn Wingfield Campe-master Generall: Sir Coniers Clifford, Sergeant Maior, Sir George Carew, Master of the Ordinance: Iohn Bucke Prouost Marshall: Oliuer Lambert, Quarter-Master, and Roger Astley, Secretary. The Colonels of the Army were the Earle of Sussex, Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrat, Sir Richard Winkfeild, and Sir Edward Winkfeild of the Voluntaries, and for the Dutch, was the Count Lodowicke, in all about ten thousand men. The priuate Counsell for this expedition being selected, certain instructions were sent sealed to euery shippe, with a commandement to the Captain, not to break them open, till such time as they came to the South-Cape, vnlesse they happened to bee seuered from the Fleete by storme or mischance; but if taken by an enemy, then to cast them ouer-bord.

Officers for Land seruices.

(266) Thus ready for Seas, vpon the first of Iune a warning Peece being shot off, all weyed Anchors, and with a gallant shew, and full sailes followed the Lord Admirall; but the wind scanting before they past Cornwall, they were enforced backe into the Sound, where staying two dayes, vppon the thirde the winde came about, and with a prosperous Gale brought them to Cape Saint Vincent, where an Irish Barke was mette with from Cadiz, which signified the strength of the Towne, and the shipping that lay in the Bay, to witte, twenty Gallies, ninety Sailes of Shippes, wherof fiue were of those great Gallions, which are called the Kings twelue Apostles, (all doubtlesse the sonnes of Thunder) two great Galliasses, three Frigats, three Argosies, twenty Biskaines; the rest were Merchants shippes, rich, and of great burden, whose ladings were munition, coine, oyle, wine, waxe, silke, cloth of gold, and quicke-siluer; some bound for the Indians, some for Britaine, some for Lisbone, and some for other places. Newes most acceptable vnto the Generals, who hasting thitherwards, vpon Sunday the twentieth of Iune, assaied at the Friery of Saint Sebastian, on the west side of Cadiz, to land their men, but the place strong, and the Seas going high, their purpose was hindered.

The King of Spaines twelue Apostles, but far vnlike Christs.

(267) May I relate with hope of credite what others haue reported vpon their owne eye-sight? At the first approch of this Royall Nauy before Cadiz, a faire Doue (a fortunate Presager) betimes in the morning, is said to haue lighted vpon the Mayne-yard of the Lord Admirals ship, and there to haue sate quietly the space of three howres, euery man gazing, but no man suffered to harme her: as also the last day of their departure thence, another Doue presented her self in the same Order, and in the same shippe, growing wonderfully tame and familiar with the men, and so continued with them till they came into England.

Yet rich ladings of the Spanish Ships.

A fortunate presage.

(268) The day following their approch, being the first of the weeke, the Spanish ships in the road, in number fifty nine, attended with twenty Gallies, by the aduise of their * Admirall, shot with the tide within the point of Maine-land, vnto Castle Puntall, and in the straites of the Baye, sorted themselues in good order, and of a reasonable distance, aswell to offend the enemy, as to relieue each others interchangeably.

* Diego Sote.

(269) The Bay was narrow whereinto they had entred, full of Rocks, shelues, & sands, al which notwithstanding, it was in Councell determined, that the Lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Sir Francis Vere, Sir George Carew, and Sir Robert Southwell, with some Louden's, and a Squadron of the Low-Country shippes, should beginne the fight; which was most valiantly attempted, maintained, & continued, the thundring shot battering their bulks, and renting their shrowdes.

The Nauall fight at Cadiz.

(270) In the heate whereof, the Earle of Essex, (in Counsell appointed to keepe the Maine battell) vpon the sodaine from Port Saint Maries side, thrust himselfe formost in this Sea-fight, which the other Generall perceiuing, and the Arke-Royall too vnweldy for that narrow water, tooke into his Pinnesse, and forwarded the fight to the end: Meane while the Gallies were assailed by Sir Iohn Winkfeild, who with his small shippes so hanselled their sides, as they were forced to creepe by the Shoare, and so got passage at the Bridge, contrary to the expectation of the English, whose eyes were euer ayming at the fairest Marke, which indeed was the Philip, so battered with Bullets that hee beganne to stagger, and giue ouer fight; whose souldiers seeking to sane themselues by water, and swimming, set this Apostle (their Admirall) on fire, by whose example, the Saint Thomas, another of Spaines Apostles did the like, least the English should leade them in triumph of their victory. The rest of the Spanish Fleet ranne themselues on ground in the Bay of Port Reall, to gaine some breathing time from their still following pursuers.

Charles Howard L. Admirall.

The Spanish Admirall set on fire.

(271) These seruices thus forwarded, the Earle of Essex forthwith landed his mē vnder the Blockhouse Puntall, about a mile westward from Cadiz, whence it was thoght expedient to send some Regiments to the Bridge on the West of the Iland, to impeach all succours that should come from the Maine: To which seruice were sent Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Thomas Gerrard (now Lord Gerrard) and Sir Coniers Clifford with a power of twelue hundred strong. Meanewhile the Generall Essex with the Earle of Sussex, Count Ladowicke, Lord Harbert, Lord Burk, Sir George Carew (now Lord Carew) and others took towards Cadiz.

The English goe on land.

(272) The side of their entrance was fortified with a Wall through the necke of the Promontory from sea to sea, and a Counterskarpe raised some distance, where were built two Bulwarkes, and a Curtaine for the stronger defence of the Town, the enemy hauing also an aduantage from the higher ascent, played sore vpon the English to their great annoyance, insomuch that the formost began to giue backe from the Gate, which the Earle of Essex perceiuing, to engage his souldiers resolutions, caught his owne Colours and cast them ouer the Wall into the Towne, giuing withall a most hote assault vnto the Gate, where to saue the honour of their Ensigne, happy was hee that could first leape downe from the Wall, and with shotte and sword make way through the thickest presse of the enemy. The Towne thus surprised, the Lord Admirall hasted to second the charge, when a hote encounter ensued; for the streets were very narrow, so as but two could march on breast, and from their flat roofed houses, heapes of stones were tumbled downe, to the great hurt of many of the English, who nethlesse droue the enemy before them into the Market place, where the worthy Sir Iohn Winkfeild, sore wounded at the Gate in his thigh, was shotte with a Musket from a loope-hole of the Castle into the head, and presently died.

(273) But the Towne and Castle surrendred, a Procla-

The Christian vsage of the English towards the conquered.

Proclamation was made to stay the fury of the Souldier, and the slaughter of the Spaniard, with commaundement vpon paine of death, that no man shold offer violence or harm to any religious person, woman or child. And such honourable care had the LL. Generals for the Inhabitants, that they sent them in their owne Pinnaces vnto Porto Santta Maria; the Ladies and Gentlewomen first, who were suffered to depart in their costliest apparrell, and richest Iewels: and to saue them from the spoiles or any the least wrong of the ruder Souldiers or Seamen, the Generals themselues in persons stood at the Water sides, to see them shipped without hurt or violence.

(274) The rich Bishoppe of Cusco being taken Prisoner, without any ransome was released, and all other of sacred Orders or Habite suffered without touch to depart; such was the heroicall Clemency of these most noble and truly-English Generals, to the great glory of our Nation, as the Spaniards themselues were forced to confesse. The Town thus won, the spoile thereof was giuen to the English Captains and Souldiers, the wearing clothes of the inhabitants onely excepted, and the Citizens compounding with the Lords Generall, to pay an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats for their ransome, were suffered to depart: for payment whereof, forty of the chiefest Citizens, Cauallcroes, Clergy-men, and Merchants, were brought pledges into England til the mony was paid.

The Citizens ransome.

Iob. Stow, in Annal.

(275) The like accord was attempted by the Shippes which had runne themselues on ground, whose number was about fifty two, many of them Marchants, and all most richly laden, as might seeme by the offers they made; for no lesse then two millions and a halfe of Ducats were offered by them for the redemption: but the LL. Generals more minding honour and the seruice they came for, would heare of no compositiō but for the Merchants ships onely, which whilest it was in trauise too and fro, the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Admirall of Spaine, commanded them all together to bee set on fire, which was suddainly done: and the flames terribly mounting, forced the pitchy smoake, as thicke cloudes to darken the Aire. Among these were two of the Spanish Apostles, the Mathew and the Andrew; the first of which was saued by the Lord Admirals directions, & the second was quenched by Sir Thomas Gerrard, in whose bottome himselfe returned for England.

The Ships make offer for their redemption.

(276) Thus in an instant, a Fleet, ful of men, marchandize, victuall, armour, & twelue hundred peeces of Ordinance, all valued by themselues, at twelue Millions of Ducats, was suddenly sunke, consumed or taken; the Towne also ransacked, euery Souldier bringing some portion of her rich spoiles into England, to shew the seruice he performed at Cadiz. The Towne they burnt, sauing the Churches onely: the Walles they battered, and Towers demolished, the Iland it selfe they burned, razed and spoiled, laying all waste before them, and leauing the rubbish to declare the ruines which the English had made.

Iune 30.

(277) Vpon the fift of Iuly the Earle of Essex with his, abandoned Cadiz, the Lord Admirall being gone on boord some sixe dayes before; and the next day the whole Fleet set saile Westward towards Faro a Towne in Algarua; where the Earle desirous to doe some further exploite vpon the terra firma of Spaine, landed his men (the Lord Admirall on board securing the seas) and marching to Faro hee found it empty of men, the Inhabitants being fledde with much of their substance, and the Towne left destitute of victuall: yet in the Nunnery and in the Bishoppes Palace, some goods were found, and in the Library Bookes valued at a thousand Markes; and among other prizes of note, the faireſt Culuerin the King of Spaine had, was there found, and seased vpon; the English forraged the Country for 3. leagues about, and burnt the towne Lotha without any resistance.

The English depart from Cadiz.

The attempt on the firme-land.

(278) Thence the first of August the LL. Generals fell before the Groine, where seeing no shippes stirring, and the Seas altogether cleared; vpon the seuenth of the same moneth they safely and very richly arriued at Plimouth, to the great honour of England, glory of their Queene, and renowne of their owne valours and famous aduentures.

The English returne.

(279) But as the wrongs offered by the Spaniards, seemed to the English farre greater then was yet the reuenge: so also the most prudent Queene held it still fitte to finde King Philip more worke at home, and therefore a third voyage was vndertaken the yeere following, whereof Robert Earle of Essex was made as well Lord Generall for the Land, as Admirall for the sea; hauing for the one seruice, his Vice-Admirall, the Lord Thomas Howard, Knight of the Order, and his Rere-Aamirall, Sir Walter Rawleigh, Captaine of the Guard; for the other, his Lieutenant Generall was Charles Lord Mountioy Knight of the Order; his Marshall, Sir Francis Vere Coronell Generall of the Low-Countries Forces; Sir George Carew Lord President of Munster, Master of his Ordinance; and Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Sergeant Maior of the field. The whole number consisted of sixe thousand men, besides Mariners, for which an hundred and twenty shippes were furnished, whereof seuenteene were her Maiesties, sixty men of Warre, the rest for victuall and transportation. These vpon the ninth of Iuly were embarked at Plimouth for the Ilands of Azores, and hauing cleared sixty Leagues fell fowle by a Tempest, and were driuen backe againe to Plimouth, and againe thence set saile vpon the 17. of August next following.

A.D. 1597

(280) Vpon the fifteenth of September they fell with the Isles Flores, Euernes, Fayall, and Pike; al which submitted themselues to the Lord Generals deuotion; whence weying their Anchors, they made saile for Saint Michaels, and there before the Towne cast them againe, where it was determined that Sir Walter Rawleigh should keep the sea, whiles the Lord Generall with two thousand should land elsewhere in the Iland; which they did, and sacked the rich town Villa Franca: but the seas going high, and the Winters stormes approaching, after the spoile of those places, the destruction of a Carracke richly laden with Sugars, fired by her owne men, the taking of a Brasile mān, and the surprize of three prizes which they brought into England, valued at foure hundred thousand Ducats, they returned, the Spaniard euery where hauing the worst.

Villa Franca sacked.

(281) These stirres on the seas brought yet further mischiefes on the Spaniard, by hindring the traficke of Marchandise, as well for their owne trade & comerce with others, as for others trading into Spain; among whom Sigismond, the young and new elected King of Polonia, found himself most agreeued: whose Ambassador for that businesse vnto the Queen, was one Paulus de Ialine, a Polone Gentleman, learned, eloquent, and very audacious, (if not ouer-much) who bringing *letters of credence from his King, had audience at Greenwich, her Maiesty sitting vnder her cloath of Estate, and with her Nobles, attending the summe of his message, which the Polonian beganne with more then an ordinary Grace.

Sigismond Kal Polonia his Ambassage to the Queene.

* Dated 19. of May.

July 25.

(282) Whose tenour was filled with blasts of discontent, conceiued by his potent Master the King of Polonia, and caused by the greeuances of his Marchants, who not onely were depriued of some priuiledges in England, but the sea which is made free by the Omnipotent stopped, and the trades of his Marchants into Spaine by her Highnes Edicts debarred, cōtrary to the law both of Nature & of Nations: that his Master as he could not be moued to diminish any part of his loue towards her Maiesty, so yet could hee not but relieue his owne subiects; and the rather for that it touched all his Nobility, whose reuenews consisted chiefly vpon the Trade of Marchandizing. That hee had hitherto forborne all meanes of requite, quite, though her Maiesty well knew, of meanes he had no want; and now had sent to aduertise her Highnesse in a louing manner by him his Ambassador, seeing that his letters to that purpose heretofore sent, had not beene regarded, in whose name he now required, that the seas might be open, a restitution made, and the Trade Westward to Spaine bee free, according to equity; otherwise his Master would no longer neglect his Subiects losses, but would take in hand a meanes of redresse. As for her Maiesties wars with Spaine, that ought not to hinder Nauigation by the common Law of Nature (as hee auouched) nor, for her respect should the ancient friendship betwixt the potent Polonian and the mighty King of Spaine bee broken, nor with the house of Austria, whose daughter his Prince had now married, which bound him in a double band of loue. But hee trusted (his Masters request bearing such equity) her Maiesty would regard it, and command satisfaction of these things forthwith to bee made, to the content of his Prince, and safety of her selfe, which thing hee wished, & therof warned her Maiesty. And with other like wordes ended as peremptorily as he beganne.

The summe of the Ambassadors Oration.

(283) Vnto which confident Oration, the Queen her selfe not brooking to be braued by any Prince in the World, presently made answere, preuenting the Lord Chancellor therein who was about to doe it, and both roundly and learnedly in the Latine (the same language wherein the message was deliuered) replyed: the very words as neere as could bee taken from her mouth were these.

Queene Elizabeths answere vnto Polonian.

(284) Heu quàm decepta fui. Expectaui Nuncium: tu verò querelam mihi adduxisti; per literas te accepi esse Legatum, te verò Heraldum inuenio. Nunquam in vita talem Orationem audiui. Miror, sanè miror, tantam & tam insolutam in publico audaciam; neque puto si Rex tuus adesset, talia verba protulisset: Sin aliquid tale tibi in mandatis commisit (quod quidem valdè dubito) ie tribuendum, quòd cùm Rex sit Iuuenis, & non tam iure Sanguinis quàm Electionis, atque etiam nouitèr electus, non tam benè percipiat quid inter Reges conuenit, quàm Maiores sui nobiscum obseruarunt, & alij fortasse deinceps obseruabunt. Quod at te attinet, videris multos libros perlegisse, libros tamen Principum non attigisse, neque intelligere quid inter Reges conuenit. Cum verò Ius Naturæ & Gentium commemoras, Hoc scito esse ius naturæ & Gentium, vt cum bellum inter Reges intercedat, liceat alteri alterius vndique allata Præsidia intercipere, & ne in damnum suum conuertantur, præuidere: Hoc scito esse Ius Naturæ, & Gentium; Vbi itidem Domum Austriæ narras (quam iam tanti facis) non te lateat ex eadem Domo non defuisse qui Regnum Poloniæ regi tuo intercipere voluissent. De reliquis quæ cum multa sunt, & singulatim deliberanda, non sunt huius loci ac temporis, accipies quod à quibusdam Consiliarijs huic rei designatis deliberandum fuerit. Interim valeas & quiescas.

(285) Oh how was I deceiued! I looked for an Embassage, but thou hast brought me complaints; I vnderstood by thy letters that thou wert a Legate, but I finde thee an Herauld; neuer since I drew breath heard I such an Oration. I maruell, truly, I maruell at so great and such vnaccustomed boldnesse in so publike an assembly; neither doe I think if the King thy Master were present, that hee would say so much: but if peraduenture he hath committed any such thing to thy charge (which surely I do much doubt) it is to be imputed vnto him, that where the King is of yeers vnripe, and not by bloud, but by election (yea and but newly aduanced) hee doth not so perfectly vnderstand the course of negotiating these kind of affaires with other Princes, which either his Ancestors haue obserued with vs, or perhaps others will obserue, who afterwardes shall succeede him. As touching thy selfe, indeede thou seemest to mee to haue read many Bookes, but not to haue perused the Bookes of Princes affaires, but vtterly to bee ignorant what is conuenient amongst Kings. And whereas thou makest mention of the Law of Nature and Nations, know, that this is the Law both Naturall and Nationall, that when Warre is waged among Princes, it is lawfull for one of them to intercept the military helpes of the other, brought from what place soeuer, so to preuent the harms which might otherwise redound on himselfe: And this againe I auow to bee the Law of Nature and Nations. Whereas likewise thou mentionest a new affinity with the house of Austria, which now thou makest so famous, and of so deare esteeme, forget not Sir, that there haue beene of that house that would haue bereft the Kingdom of Polonia from thy King. As for other points which bee not to be spoken off at this place, and time, because they are many and seuerally to bee considered of one after another: thou shalt waite for such further answere as shall bee resolued on by some of my Councell, to whom I will assigne the consideration of this matter. In the meane time farewell and be quiet. And thus Lion-like rising, daunted the malepert Orator no lesse with her stately port and maiesticall departure, then with the tartnesse of her princely checkes: and turning to the Traine of her Attendants, thus said; Gods death my Lords (for that was her oath euer in anger) I haue been enforced this day to scowre vp my old Latine, that hath laine long in rusting.

(286) To entreat a Peace betwixt these Christian Princes of England and Spaine, the King of Denmarke likewise did send an Embassage vnto Queene Elizabeth, as also to deliuer the Gartar worne by his Predecessor lately departed this world, with an earnest entreaty to continue the amity betwixt their two Realmes. The man was Arnald Whitfield Chancellor of Denmarke, iudicious, learned, and wise, who with farre better temper and tearms well couched, deliuered his oration; which ended, hee most humbly propounded certain requests (wherunto her Maiesty presently replyed) which in effect were these.

An Ambassador from the King of Denmarke, Sept. 7.

(287) 1. That the League of peace confirmed betwixt the Crownes of England & Denmark might be continued as formerly it had beene in the late deceased Kings dayes, & other his Predecessors, which now the present King his Master did instantly desire: To which shee answered: that she was most willing thereunto, wishing that the now-King would preserue the same amity no worse then his Predecessors had done.

The Danish Ambassadors requests.

2 That whereas much Christian bloud was spilt in these continuall warres betwixt England & Spain, it would please her Maiesty to giue her consent, that the King his Master might make a motion of Peace; and as hee found the occasion, so to proceede. Wherunto she replyed, that shee thought his King was too yong, and vnexperienced, to conceiue throughly the cause of breach betwixt her and Spaine; and as the League had not beene broken on her part, or with her roiall consent, so an accord should not be sought after by her, nor by any in her behalfe, for (quoth shee) I would haue the King of Denmarke, & all Princes Christian and Heathen to know, that England hath no need to craue Peace; nor my selfe endured one howres feare since I attained the Crowne thereof, being guarded with so valiant and faithfull Subiects.

An heroicke answere of an vndaunted Queene.

3 His third request was, if it stood with her Maiesties good liking, to permit open traffique, that the Marchants of Denmarke might transport their goods into Spain without danger on the narrow seas as heretofore some of them had sustained to their great losse. Her Maiesties answere was, that it was to her vnknowne, that any of his Masters good Subiects were in any wise molested, or their goods stayed, and that vpon iust proofe thereof made, a redresse shall bee ordained, to the full satisfaction of the King, and content of his Subiects.

4 Lastly, hee was to returne the Gartar, (wherewith her Maiesty had honnured the late deceased King) as the manner is of forraine Princes to doe, which hee with great reuerence there deliuered;

Which her Maiesty accepting; yet told him, shee was right sorry to receiue it, for thereby shee was put in mind of the losse of a most Noble Brother, & a most louing friend. But howsoeuer the Danish Marchants now complained of losse, the English Marchandize were arrested in the Sound, for release whereof, Ambassadors were sent into Denmarke, where a restitution was made by the King, with such honour and bounty, as well satisfied her Maiesty, and contented her Marchants.

Tir-Oen rebellion in Ireland.

(288) But a more dangerous Agent, working for Spaine, was the Irish Tir-Oen, who serpent-like lay lurking vpon his aduantage to raise the Standard of Rome, and to diuert subiection from the English Crowne. This mans fortunes wee haue formerlie declared, how being the sonne of a Bastard, or a banished fugitiue, he was raised by her Maiesties* meer bounty to the dignitie of an Earle, and stood in authority ranked with the best; nor so onely; but being twice in danger of the capitall crimes (once for a murther, next for vsurping the Title of O-Neale) vpon better hopes, of her princely clemency, twice got pardon for his life. The times now dangerous, and Ireland too ready to receiue forraine powers, it was thought conuenient to imploy Sir Iohn Norris (that famous Warriour) into those parts, with thirteene hundied of the Netherland old Souldiers, newly retired from the wars in Britaine.

* See Cambdens Brit. in Ireland.

Sir Iohn Norris sent into Ireland.

Tirones first flying out.

(289) Hugh Baron of Dungannon, now Earle of Tir-Oen, fearing least the English would make their nests, where himselfe meant to build, namely in some Castle, at the mouth of Lough-Earne, sodainly assailed the fort of Blacke-Water, by which the entry lay into his Country, and got it by surrender. Which done, he wrote to Kildare, to side with him against his wrongs receiued of the Lord Deputy; yea and at the same instant, to Sir Iohn Norris (appointed Lord Generall) that hee might be mildly dealt with, and not be driuen headlong vpon the dangerous rockes of disloialty.

Tiroen gets the fort of Blacke-water.

(290) But how his loyalty stood affected vnto her Maiesty (his raiser) was well perceiued by the powers which hee retained about him, being alwaies guarded with a thousand horsemen, and sixe thousand two hundred and fourescore foot of Vlster, besides two thousand three hūdred of Conaught; which euer lay ready at his command; whereupon all of them being proclaimed Traitors; the flames of rebellion beganne more violently to burst forth, which for a long time, and not without losse of much bloud could hardly bee quenched: for though the Lord Generall were not inferior in strength of men, yet the aduantages of the enemy were such, that the time was rather spent in taking of booties, and friuolous Parlies, then in any memorable exploit; the one part waiting for fitter opportunities, and the other looking euery day for his promised succours from Spaine.

He and his adherents proclamed Traitors.

(291) But to spare the effusion of Christian bloud Queen Elizabeth who euer minded Mercy more then Iustice, caused her Treasurer & Chiefe Iusticiar of that Kingdome, as her Commissioners to confer with this discontented Earle, and others his adherents, before whom, Tir-Oen complained of wrongs offered him by Sir Henry Bagnall Mareschall, aswell to the preiudice of his estate, as of his esteeme with the Queene, the Lord Deputy, Lord Generall, and others, and therupon exhibited a Petition in humble maner containing these requests. That himselfe and all his followers might bee pardoned of their crimes, and bee restored to their former estates; that they might freely exercise their Romish Religion without molestation; that no Garrison Souldiers, Shiriffe, or other Officer should interdeale within the iurisdiction of his Earledome; that the Company of fifty horsemen with the Queenes pay might bee restored to him, in the same State as formerly hee had lead them; that the spoiles of his Country, and people might be punished, and that Sir Henry Bagnall should pay him a thousand pound promised in Dowry with his sister, whom Tir-Oen had married, and who was now deceased. Others likewise laid out their greeuances conceiued; such were O-Donell, Brian Mac-Hugh-Oge, Mac Mahun, and Euer Mac-Conley, who receiued most reasonable answeres to all their demands.

Sir Henry Wallop. Sir Rob. Gardiner

Propositions made to the Rebels.

(292) But vnto them the Commissioners likewise proposed certain Articles: as, That they should forthwith lay downe their Armes, disperse their Forces, acknowledge submissiuely their disloialties, admit the Queenes officers in their Gouernments, reedifie the Forts they had defaced, suffer the Garrisons to liue without disturbance, make restitutions of spoiles taken, confesse vpon their oath how farre they had dealt with forraine Princes, and finallie to renounce all forraine aide. But these propositions not pleasing the palate of those Rebels, they departed with a resolution to maintaine their owne demands. Which moued Norris the Generall aided with the Lord Deputy to march with his Army vnto Armagh; whose approch (euer dreadful to his enemies) when Tir-Oen heard of, in great perplexity hee forsooke the Fort of Blacke-Water, set on fire the villages about, and plucked downe the Towne of Dunganon, with part of his owne house, bewailing his estate to bee past recouery; & was so much dejected in mind, as hee sought nothing else but where to hide his rebellious head.

Preparations against Tyron.

(293) The Country now wasted, and no victuals to bee had, Norris set a Garrison in the Church of Armagh, strengthned Monahan, and proclaimed Tir-Oen Traitor in his owne territories. Which done, hee stayed in Vlster without any great deeds of martiall importance, onely Tir-Oen to gaine time presented vnto him a fained submission, signed with his owne hand, cast himselfe downe (a rare and vncouth ceremony) at the Queenes pictures feet, vngirt his sword, and craued pardon vpon his knees: and yet in the meane time dealt he for aides out of Spaine, and so far preuailed, as that Messengers were sent from King Philip, with capitulations that the King of Spaine at a time prefixed should send them a competent Army to ioine with the Irish, that all conditions of peace with the English should be reiected, and that the Rebels should bee furnished with munition from Spaine.

(294) Hereupon (though there was a cessation from Armes) hee fell to harry and wast the Country, to burne villages, to driue away booties, and hauing done what hee could or would, as it were pricked in conscience, hee once againe put on the vizard of simulation, and sued for pardon and peace: which the better to effect, hee sent the letters of king Philips promises vnto the L. Deputy with the causes of his owne discontents, which moued him to doe what he did. And surely such was his dexteritie, or his Destiny, or the English no lesse dangerous, then frequent securitie, negligence and confidence, or the sparing of money by the grand disbursers, or the inbred lenity of the too-clement Queen, that his faire wordes were euer beleeued, and his foule offences pardoned: but whose fault soeuer, most of Connaught was now reuolted, all Vlster rebellious, onely seuen Castles kept for the Queene.

(295) In which desperate estate, Thomas Lord Burrough, a man full of courage, was sent Lord Deputy into Ireland; who no sooner arriued, but Norris either crossed by some higher-swaying Powers, or by his fortune in these his proceedings (the seruices there being farre different from those his others, in other parts imployed) through griefe & discontent, (the too vsuall guerdon of many a Noble Seruitor) as was thought ended his life.

(296) The Lord Deputy no sooner had receiued the sword, and taken the charge of the Kingdome of Ireland, but hee made forward to meete with the Rebels, holding it good policy to cut off delayes, which which commonly increaſe the abilities of the enemie. Tir-oen on the other ſide, as boldly made his reſiſtance, and in a dangerous ſeruice encountered him at the Moiry, where the Lord Burrough by his valour made the way, and moſt valiantly wanne the Fort of Blackewater, (repaired and reenforced by the Rebels) the only ſtrength (beſides Woods) that the Tir-oen had. To reſcue this Peece, immediately the enemie ſhewed himſelfe: againſt whom Henry Earle of Kildar preſently marching with a Coronet of horſe, and certaine voluntaries, (gentlemen of the better ſort) where he diſcomfited the enemy, though with loſſe of ſome men of note; as of Francis Vaughan, brother to the Lord Deputies wife, Robert Turner Sergeant Maior, and the two Foſter-brethren of the Earle Kildare, whoſe deaths hee ſo tooke, as within few daies after himſelfe died for very griefe.

Blackwater again beſieged.

(297) The Fort reenforced with men and munition, and the Lord Deputy vpon ſeruice in other parts; Tir-oen now wauering betweene hope, feare, and ſhame, thought beſt to aſſay it by ſiege, as the place of greateſt importance to further his deſignes; for that loſt, hee ſaw his fortunes muſt downe, and thereupon with his ſtrongeſt power, he beleaguered it. The Lord Deputy hearing thereof, prepared ſtraightway to reſcue the place, and marching with full pace and aſſurance of victorie, whether through too forward a minde, diſtemperature of body, aire, or of bogges, arreſted hee was with ſickneſſe, and violently cut off, by vntimely death, leauing to her Maieſty a miſſe in her Iriſh Eſtate, and a further ſecurity to the ranging rebelles.

The Lord Burrough dieth in Ireland.

A.D. 1598.

The Earle of Ormond Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(298) The gouernment of Ireland was then committed to the Earle of Ormond vnder the Title of Lieutenant Generall of the Armie, and vnto the Lord Chanceller Sir Robert Gardiner; vnto whom Tir-oen (after his accuſtomed manner) in a long letter recapitulated his great grieuances, leauing not out the leaſt offence of the Souldiers, or actions of the Sheriffes; his breach of couenants with Sir Iohn Norris hee coldly excuſeth, and laid his complaints againſt his enemies (the Engliſh) who had intercepted and ſuppreſſed his ſubmiſſion to the Queene, that they had raiſed intolerable impoſitions vpon the Nobles, and Commons; and that the reuenues of Ireland was ſhared among Counſelers, Lawyers, Souldiers, and Notaries: by which and other like ouertures, it was manifeſt that hee intended to extirpate the Engliſh quite out of Ireland.

(299) All this while his Siege lay before the Fort of Blackewater; for the raiſing whereof, Sir Henry Bagnall (the bittereſt enemy that Tir-oen euer had) with fourteene Enſignes of the choiſeſt troopes were ſent, whom the Earle met neere vnto Armagh, and beeing egged on with a fretfull deſire of reuenge, bent all his force againſt the Marſhall, where beganne a bloudy conflict, and was continued with the death of that worthy Souldier (fighting amongſt the thickeſt) whereby Tir-oen obtained not onely a ioyous triumph ouer his priuate enemy, but withall went away with a glorious victory ouer the Engliſh, who neuer ſince they firſt ſet footing in Ireland receiued ſo great an ouerthrow: for therein thirteene valiant Captaines loſt their liues, fifteene hundred common Souldiers were rowted and put to ſhamefull flight, diſparkled and cut in peeces. Vpon this diſaſter the Garriſon Souldiers (hauing with loyall hearts and weapons in hand, vnto extreame famine and exceeding diſtreſſe, held out to the laſt) laſtly ſurrendred the Peece of Blackwater vnto the Rebels; by which ouerthrow and ſurrender, the Iriſh became furniſhed with armour and munition to maintaine their warres, and Tir-oen renowned all the Realme ouer, as their onely Horatius, and founder of their freedome.

The Engliſh foiled at Blackwater

(300) Himſelfe ouer-ioyed with theſe gotten victories, ſwelled aboue meaſure with an haughty arrogancy, commanding all things as ſole Monarch of Ireland. Into Mounſter hee ſent Owny Mac-Rory-Og-O-More with foure thouſand preying rogues, to forrage the Countrey, and the rable that daily reſorted vnto them, burned the houſes of the Engliſh, ranſacked their ſubſtance and killed very many; Iames Fitz-Thomas one of the family of the Deſmonds they ſet vp as Earle of Deſmond, yet ſo, that hee ſhould hold as Tenant in Fee of the O-Neale, (the Earle of Tir-oen) and thus after a moneth, when they had kindled this fire and ſet Mounſter in a flame, they returned laden with rich booties and ſpoile. Tir-oen in the meane time had ſent his letters to King Philip of Spaine, wherein he ſounded his victories with a full trumpe, aſſuring him that he would heare of no peace with the Engliſh, were the conditions neuer ſo indifferent, and would for his part inuiolately keepe his promiſes with the Spaniſh King.

(301) In this deſperate eſtate ſtood Ireland when Queene Elizabeth choſe Robert Earle of Eſſex, to bee Lord Lieutenant and Gouernor Generall thereof: a Peere in regard of his approoued wiſdome, fortitude, and fidelity, thought fitteſt to repaire the detriments and loſſes therein ſuſtained, and in ſuch deere eſteeme with his Soueraigne, and intire loue of the people, as the heauens ſeemed to haue framed him for the delight of man. In whom ſhined all ſparkles of true Nobility and Martiall honor, had not fortune marred all that the other graces had made. His commiſſion was large, and authority, and led no leſſe then twenty thouſand complet Souldiers, whereof ſixteene thouſand were foot, and the reſt horſe-men, ſo well furniſhed and prouided, as the like had neuer beene ſeene before in Ireland.

Robert Earle of Eſſex Lieutenant of Ireland.

(302) Thus honourably accompanied with the flower of Engliſh Gallants, and well-wiſhing acclamations of the people, with a ſtrange thunder-clap in a cleere Sunne-ſhine day, hee ſet forward from London, and arriuing in Ireland receiued the Sword; where (toward the end of March) falling in counſell touching his affaires, it was thought fitteſt by wiſe Statiſts, that Mounſter ſhould bee cleared of thoſe petty Rebels lying neerer, and of more validity then the remote Vlſter, of ſmall wealth and leſſe account. Whereupon, contrary to his owne opinion formerly deliuered (whiles hee was in England) and his directions from her Maieſtie, in Ireland hee made firſt into Mounſter, and became terrible vnto the Rebelles of thoſe parts, chaſing them before him into the woods, and ſo cleared that Prouince, with more expence of time, and loſſe of men, then was heere well liked by the State.

The Earle of Eſſex enters Mounſter.

(303) Hence he made into Leinſter, againſt the O-Conors and O-Moiles, who had gathered head and taken Armes againſt their obedience; whom in light skirmiſhes he fortunately vanquiſhed; whence he ſent Sir Conyers Clifford Gouernour of Conaught one way towards Bellike, whilſt hee himſelfe tooke an other way, ſo to diſtract the force of Tir-oen. Sir Conyers with a power of fifteene hundred ſtrong, marched ouer the Mountaines of Curlew, where O-Rorke and his Rebels ſuddenly aſſailed them, being out-wearied with trauell, and their powder neere ſpent; in which conflict, amongſt many other ſlaine, Sir Conyers Clifford himſelfe, as alſo Sir Alexander Ratcliffe, ſealed the teſtimony of their valours with the loſſe of their liues.

Sir Conyers Clifford incountred with and ſlaine.

(304) The Lord Generall hearing of this ouerthrow, made towards Vlſter, and came into the frontiers as farre as Louth, where Tir-oen, on the other ſide of the River, from the Hilles made his Brauado. But falling into his wonted vaine of diſſimulation, deſired a parley with the Lord Lieutenant, which he altogether reiecting, anſwered, that if the Earle would conferre with him, hee ſhould find him the next morning in the head of his troops: on

He enters Vlſter.

Tir-oen ſueth for Parley but is reiected.

on which day, when after a light skirmish, a horseman of Tir-oens troopes, with a loud voice cried, that the Earle was not willing to fight, but to parley vpon peace with the Lord Generall; it was againe denied him. But the next day, as the Lord Lieutenant was in his March forward, one Hagan sent from Tir-oen, met him, and declared that the Earle most humbly desired to haue the Queenes mercy and peace, and withall besought, that his Lordship would be pleased to afford him audience, which if hee would grant, then would hee with all reuerence attend him at the Foord of the Riuer not farre from Louth.

Essex and Tir-oen meet in Parley.

(305) To this lastly the Lord Lieutenant assented; and sent to discouer the place, and bestowing a troope of horse vpon the next Hill, came down alone vnto the Riuer; Tir-oen attending on the other side, no sooner saw his approach, but forthwith rode his horse into the Riuer vp to the saddle, and with all semblances of a dutifull respect, most reuerently saluted his Lordshippe: where, hauing had conference the space of an houre, they both returned vnto their companies. There followed the Earle of Essex, Con, a base sonne of Tir-oen, instantly intreating in his fathers name, that certaine principall men might be admitted to a conference, whervnto his honour condiscended.

A further conference.

(306) And taking with him the Earle of Southampton, Sir George Bourchier, Sir Warham St-Leger, Sir Henry Danuers, Sir Edward Wingfield, and Sir William Constable, went to the Foord, where Tir-oen with his brother Cormoc, Mac Gennys, Mac Guir, Euer mac Cowley, Henry Ouington, and O-Quin, attended their comming. And falling in conference, it was concluded that certaine Commissioners should the next day meet for a treaty of peace, and in the meane time there should bee a cessation of warres, from sixe weekes to sixe weekes, vntill the first of May: yet so, as it might bee free on both sides, after fourteene daies warning giuen, to resume hostility a fresh. And if any of Tir-oens confederates would not thereto consent, to be prosecuted at the Lord Lieutenants pleasure.

Exceptions against Essex his seruices.

(307) But howsoeuer these his proceedings pleased the Marshalists, yet was her Maiestie highly incensed, that such expeditions had beene made without her directions, beeing informed that the Spring, Summer, and Autumme, were spent without seruice vpon the Arch-rebell, that her men were diminished, and large summes of money consumed, without doing that for which he was sent; that by this meanes the Rebels were encouraged, and the Kingdome of Ireland laid at hazard to bee lost: Which his defaults (for so they were apprehended) were (as he conceiued) much aggrauated, by some that were hard against him, in her attentiue eare; vpon which surmize Her Maiesties sharpe letters receiued (though hee had excused his seruice by others whom himselfe sent at the same season) so ouerpressed his troubled thoughts, as leauing his charge to be managed by others, hee made into England, well hoping to pacifie his Soueraignes displeasure with satisfaction from his own mouth, and at Noneuch had accesse to her presence, where after a short welcome, hee was commanded to his chamber; and soone after was committed to the custody of the Lord Keeper.

October 2.

(308) No sooner almost was the Lord Generall departed Ireland, but that Tir-oen (notwithstanding the cessation from warre) drawing his forces together, addressed himselfe for the Field, vnto whom Sir William Warren was sent, to charge him with breach of promise; but he swelling in pride, peremptorily answered, that his doings were according to couenants, hauing giuen warning before, and his cause iust, for that the Lord Lieutenant was committed in England, vpon whose honour hee reposed his whole estate; neither would hee haue any thing to doe with the Counsellors of Ireland, in whom (as he said) he neuer found either safety or truth. And thereupon presuming vpon Spaine, and giuing it forth that there would bee shortly an alteration in England; he sends O-Donell into Conaught, receiueth tumultuous persons, strengtheneth the weake, and comforteth the distrustfull, glorying euery where that he would restore againe the ancient Religion, and liberty of Ireland, and expell the English from thence; to which end, some money and munition were sent him from Spaine, with Indulgences from Rome; and (for an especiall fauour) the Pope sent him a plume of Phenix feathers, for a trophey of his victories, as Vrban long before him sent a Coronet of Peacocks tailes vnto King Iohn, when hee was first inuested Lord of Ireland.

The Popes present bestowed on Tiroen.

(309) Tir-oen thus feathered for a higher flight, Peacocke like to shew his owne pride and greatnesse by his personall presence, vnder a religious pretext to worship a peece of the wodden Crosse of Christ, reputed to bee kept in the Monastery of the holy Crosse in Tipperary, in the mid-winter would thither on Pilgrimage; whence hee sent out Mac-Guir with a number of rifeling robbers, to despoile and prey on the peaceable subiects; with whom Sir Warham St.-Leger met, and at the first race with his Lance ranne Mac-Guir through the body, and was by him runne through himselfe. Whereupon Tir-oen fearing more blowes, made ready to returne from Mounster sooner then was expected, or himselfe meant.

(310) At this time Charles Blunt Lord Montioy (afterwards created Earle of Deuon-shire) was sent Lord Lieutenant Generall into Ireland, who with small port and little solemnity, entred vpon the Gouernment, the state of that Countrie lying desperately diseased, and almost past recouery. At his first comming, hearing that Tir-oen was to depart Mounster, hee hastned to stoppe his passage in Fereal, and there to giue him Battell, which the Earle preuented by taking another way, hauing intelligence of the Lord Generals designes; but the Spring drawing on, the Deputy put himselfe on his March towards Vlster, with purpose to driue the Earle to a stand, whiles Sir Henry Docwra at Lough-foile, and Sir Matthew Morgan at Balosshanon planted the Garrisons, which they with small adoe effected, and suppressed the Rebelles in diuers ouerthrowes.

The Lord Montioy Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

A. D. 1600. In February.

In May.

(311) The Lord Generall likewise held Tir-oen very hard, and with light skirmishes euer put him to the worse, so that hee now perceiuing his fortune to goe bake, withdrew himselfe backe into his old corners. The Lord Lieutenant then entred into Leasse, the place of refuge and receit of all the Rebels in Leinster, where he slew Ony-Mac-Rory-Og, chiefe of the family of the O-Mores, a bloudy, bold, and desperate yong man: and so chased out the rest of those his rakehels, as that neuer since they were seene in those parts. And although in the commensing of these affaires the Equinox was past, and the winter weather begunne in that climate, yet marched he forward to the entrance of Moyery three miles beyond Dondalke.

(312) The passage into Vlster is euery where naturally cumbersome, and this way made more by the Rebels, who had fortified and blocked vp the entrance with fences of stakes stucke in the ground, with hurdles ioyned together, and stones in the midst, with turffes of earth laid betwixt hils, woods, and bogges, and manned the place with a number of Souldiers: notwithstanding, the English brake through those Pallisadoes, and beating the enemies backe, the Lord Deputy placed a Garrison eight miles from Armagh, where in memory of Sir Iohn Norris, hee named the Fort Mount-Norris: but to omit many other skirmishes in his returne, that at Carlingford was most famous, where the enemies assembled to stoppe his way, were all of them discomfited,

Tiroen againe fals off.

The Glinnes electe of Rebels.

(313) In the midst of Winter hee entred the glinnes, that is, the vallies of Leinster, a secure receptacle of the Rebels, where he brought into subiection Donel Spanioh, Phelim Mac-Feogh, and the O-Tooles, of whom hee tooke hostages. Then went he to Fereall, and draue Tirell, the most approoued warrier of all the Rebels, from his fastnesse, (that is his bogges and bushes,) into Vlster; the Territory of Fernes he laid waste, spoiled Fues, and in Breany placed a Garrison, receiuing such into mercie as deliuered vp hostages. Which done, and the Spring approching, he marched to Vlster, fortified Armagh, and went so farre forward, that he remooued Tir-oen from the Fort of Blackewater, who had very artificially encamped himselfe there.

The Pope and Spaine busied to hold vp Tir-oen.

(314) As the Lord Generall was thus busied to reduce Ireland to obedience, so the Pope and Spaine studied to hold vp Tir-oen, and to maintaine the rebellions; their Agents were a Spaniard, elected by the Pope, Arch-Bishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Clonfort, the Bishoppe of Killaloe, and Archer a Iesuite. These by praier, and promises of heauenly rewards, wonne Philip to send succours into Ireland, which forthwith hee did, vnder his Generall Don Iohn D'Aquila, a man of a conceited hope that all would bee his, as confident of much aid from the titular Earle Desmond, and from Florence Mac-Carty, a rebell of great might; wherein hee was deceiued; for Sir George Carew, Lord President of Mounster, had preuented that designe, and sent them prisoners to England, where they were kept sure.

Don Iohn De Aquila sent into Ireland.

(315) Don D'Aquila with two thousand Spaniards, all of them old trained Souldiers, with certaine Irish Fugitiues, landed at Kinsale in Mounster, the last of October, and straightwaies published a writing, wherein hee gloriously stiled himselfe with this Title, Master Generall, and Captaine of the Catholike King in the warres of God, for holding and keeping the faith in Ireland; indeauouring to make the world beleeue, that Queene Elizabeth, by the definitiue sentences of the Popes, was depriued of her Kingdomes, and her subiects absolued and freed from their Oath of allegiance, and that hee was come to deliuer them out of the Diuels iawes, and the English tyrannie, vpon which suggestions many distempered and wicked persons beganne to bandy on his side.

October Vlt.

Don Iohns Title.

(316) The Lord Deputy gathering his Companies, hasted to Kinsale and encamped neere vnto the Towne on the Land side, whiles Sir Richard Leuison with two of the Queenes Shippes inclosed the Hauen, to forbidde all accesse to the Spaniard; when from both sides, the thundering Canon played vpon the Towne; but newes beeing brought that two thousand Spaniards more were arriued at Bere-hauen, Baltimore, and Castle-hauen, Sir Richard was imployed vpon them, in which seruice he sunke fiue of their Ships.

A new supply of Spaniards vnder Alphonso O Campo

(317) Vnto these new landed Spaniards, whose Leader was Alphonso-O-Campo, O-Donell ouer the ice, by speedy iournies and vnknowen by-waies repaired; vnseene of the English; and a few daies after Tir-oen himselfe, with O-Raicke, Raimund Burke, Mac-Mahun, Randall Mac-Surley, Tirrell the Barron of Lixnaw, and the most selected choice of all the Rebels came vnto them, who mustered together made sixe thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse; all confident of victory, as being fresh, strong, and exceeding in number, where, the English were outwearied through winter siege, with scarsity of victuall, and their horse weake with sore trauell.

Tir-oens braueries.

(318) In this hope, Tir-oen, vpon an Hill not a mile from the English Campe, made a Brauado two daies together, intending to haue put these new supplies of Spaniards, with eight hundred Irish, by night into Kinsale, as by letters intercepted from Don D'Aquila did appeare. Which to preuent, the Lord Deputy appointed eight Ensignes to keepe watch, and himselfe with the President of Mounster, and the Marshall, at the foot of the Hill, chose out a conuenient plot to giue the Earle battell, who the next morning seeing the English so forward, by his bag-pipers sounded the retreat, whom the Lord Generall followed, and forced them to stand in the brincke of a bogge, where there horsemen were disordered and rowted by the Earle of Clan-Ricard.

The rebels rowted.

(319) The maine battell then wauering in feare, was violently charged by the Lord Deputy himselfe, who in his directions discharged the part of a worthy Commander, and in fighting, the office of a valiant Souldier; for the Rebels not able to withstand his fury, brake their arraies, and in disorder confusedly fled, in whose pursuite many of them felt the reuenging edge of the English sword. Tir-oen, O-Donell, and the rest flung away their weapons, and saued their liues by flight; but Alphonso O-Campo, with three other Spanish Captaines, and sixe Ensigne-bearers, were taken prisoners, nine of their Ensignes borne away by the English, and twelue hundred of his Spaniards slaine; such welcome found these new guests in Ireland. This victory obtained, both quelled the pride of the intruding Spaniards, and exceedingly daunted the hearts of the disloyall Irish; so that Tir-oen was forced into his starting holes in Vlster, O-Donell driuen into Spaine, and the rest of that rebellious rabble scattered into obscure places, where their best succour was to play least in sight.

Don Alphonso taken prisoner.

The rebels dispirkled.

(320) The Lord Generall, returning to the siege of Kinsale, beganne to raise rampires, and to mount his Canons neerer the Towne, wherein sixe daies were spent without any impeach from the Spaniard, whose courage being cut by the losse of their fellowes, sought rather how to gette cleare and bee gone, then to aduenture resistance against such a warlike opposer. D'Aquila hereupon, sent his letters by his Drumme Maior, to the Lord Deputy, wherein he craued, that some Gentleman of credit might be sent into the Towne, with whom he might Parley for a peace. Whereunto his Lordship inclined, and to that end sent thither Sir William Godolphin.

The Spaniards sue for peace.

(321) Vnto whom D'Aquila signified, that hee had found the Lord Deputy, though his eager enemy, yet an honourable person; the Irish of no valor, rude and vnciuill, yea and (that which hee sore feared) perfidious and false; That hee was sent from the King of Spaine his Master to aid two Earles, and now hee much doubted whether there were any such in Rerum natura, considering that one tempestuous puffe of warre had blowen the one of them into Spaine, and the other into the North, so as they were no more to bee seene: willing therefore hee was to treate about a Peace, that might bee good for the English, and not hurtfull to the Spaniards: albeit hee wanted nothing requisite to the holding out of the Siege, and expected euery day out of Spaine fresh supplies to finde the English worke and trouble enough.

(322) The matter thus proposed, and the English weake and weary through a long Winters siege, the Lord Deputy consented to an agreement, the Articles whereof were these.

January 2.

1 That Iohn D'Aquila should quitte the places which he held in the Kingdome of Ireland, aswell in the Towne of Kinsale, as the Forts and Castle of Baltimore, Berehauen, and Castle-hauen; and should deliuer them vnto the Lord Deputy, or to whom he should appoint.

Iohn Stow, Conclusions of peace.

2 That Don D'Aquila and his Spaniards should depart with armes, money, munition, and banners displaied, the Souldiers notwithstanding to beare no armes against the Queene of England, till such time as they were vnshipped in some part of Spaine,

3 That Shippes and victuals ſhould be granted vnto them in their departure, for their money, and at ſuch reaſonable prices as the Countrey could afford.

4 That if contrary winds inforced them into any other Port of Ireland, or elſe into England, they might be intreated as friends with ſafety of harbor, and prouiſions neceſſary for their money to further their departure.

5 That a ceſſation ſhould be from warre, a ſecurity from iniuries, and victuall granted at reaſonable rates, whiles they remained in preparing for Spaine.

6 That the Ships in which they ſhould bee imbarked might freely paſſe by other Engliſh Shippes without moleſtation; and the Shippes arriued in Spaine, might ſafely returne backe without any impeachment of the Spaniards: for ſecurity whereof, the ſaid D'Aquila ſhould deliuer for hoſtages, ſuch three of their Captaines as the Lord Deputy would chuſe. Vnto theſe Articles Don Iohn ſolemnly ſwore on the behalfe of the Catholike King his Maſter, and with his hand ſubſcribed his name, Don Iohn D Aquila.

(323) The troubleſome cloude of moſt likely dangers, thus diſſolued in Mounſters faire Aire, the coaſts of Ireland were ſhortly cleared of thoſe forraine intruders, who notwithſtanding their former great bragges, with ſhame and diſhonour embarked themſelues for home, their companies being much empaired, and proud ſpirits brought downe. And now the Ben-hadad Tir-oen, who had boaſted all Ireland was his, with fearefull flights and by-waies recouered his lurking holes in Vlſter: after he had loſt moſt of his men, whom the ſwelling and violently-running Riuers, by reaſon of Winter floods, had ſwallowed vppe; where his traitors head, burdened with the dreads of his owne deſerts, could take no reſt, no not ſo much as to breath without feare, diſtruſting euery ſhadow that hee ſaw, and ſhifting out of one by-corner before he well knew where to find another.

1. King. 20.

The guilt and feares of Tir-oen.

(324) Meane whiles, the Lord Deputy refreſhed his weary and winter beaten Souldiers, repayred the decaies, and renewed the Garriſons in Mounſter; which done, hee departed for Dublin, where wearing out the winter ſtormes, towards the ſpring, by a gentle and eaſie march, well appointed, hee returned into Vlſter, meaning to belay the Rebell on euery ſide, by planting his Forts, ſo to take him in his toile. Thus beeing approached vnto Blackewater, hee tranſported his Armie ouer the Foord vpon floates, vpon whoſe banke, beneath the old Fort, he erected a * new, to ſuch terror of the Arch-rebell, as hee ſet on fire his owne houſe at Dunganon, and got himſelfe further from danger; whether the Lord Deputy immediately marched, and made ſpoile without any ſpare; the corne fields were deſtroied, the Villages fired, and booties brought in on euery ſide. The Forts in Logh, Crew, Lough. Reogh, and Mogher Leeowd, were yeelded vp, and Garriſons placed in Lough Eaugh or Sydney, and in Monaghan, whence with their continuall ſallies, they ſo croſſed the enemies, that ſeeing themſelues inuironed about, and no way open for eſcape, like wilde beaſts they hid their heads in the thickets, forreſts, and woods, muttering complaints againſt their late magnified Tir-oen; exclaiming he had engaged the ruine of the whole Nation, for his owne priuate diſcontents, and that theſe warres, howſoeuer beneficiall to him, yet were they moſt pernicious vnto them, whereupon changing their mindes with their fortunes, beganne a vie, who ſhould be firſt in ſhewing their alteration, by comming in to the Deputy.

* Charles Mount.

Great ſpoiles made in Vlſter.

The Rebels exclaime againſt the Arch-rebell.

(325) The Earle not ignorant how their affections declined, his owne forces ſhaken, and the fidelity of his followers more and more ſuſpected, hee once more determined to preuent the worſt, by his ſubmiſſion, which in humble letters he ſent to the Queene, wherein with praiers and teares hee craued pardon of his faults: to ſuch an ebbe was the ſwelling tides of his rebellious heart brought. Her Maieſty (whoſe Nature was Mercy) euer diſtaſtiue of bloud, gaue the Lord Deputy authority to pardon his life, though hardly drawen to remit his offences, they beeing ſo many and great: His friends that affected him, and Mac Baron his brother, daily ſolicited the Deputy for his peace, which laſtly, vpon an abſolute promiſe, to put his life and reuenewes, without any condition, to the will of the Queene, was granted; and at Melliſont, accompanied with two perſons and no more, had acceſſe into the Chamber of Preſence, where the Lord Deputy ſate in a Chaire of Eſtate, moſt of his Marſhalliſts ſtanding about him.

(326) Tir-oen, in baſe and poore array, with a deiected countenance, at the very entrance fell down vpon his knees, and ſo reſted till hee was commanded to ariſe, and come neerer; when ſtepping forward a few paces, hee fell againe proſtrate, and like a moſt humble Supplicant, in words well couched (as cunning hee was both in ſpeech and action) acknowledged his ſinnes againſt God, and fault vnto her Maieſty; and thus beganne his ſubmiſſion to the Lord Generall.

In the royall clemency of my dread Soueraigne and moſt gracious Queene, I doe onely lay the hope and reſt of my now remaining eſtate; vnto whoſe pleaſure I abſolutely remit my life, and whole reuenewes; and doe moſt ſubmiſſiuely deplore mine owne miſery, beſeeching againe her mercy, whoſe bountifull fauours I haue heeretofore, and mighty powers now of late both felt and found, and well hope, that the fountaine of her euerflowing graces are not drawen dry. Let mee (I pray) bee the ſubiect, whereon her mercy may worke, and an example for euer of her mild clemency, both to diuulge her Princelie lenity, and to redeeme in ſome part the honor I haue loſt. For age I am not ſo vnſeruiceable, nor of body ſo vnable, neither in courage ſo dejected, but that my faithfull ſeruice in her behalfe, may expiate and make ſome meaſure of ſatisfaction, for theſe my many and moſt diſloyall rebellions. And yet I may iuſtly complaine, that through the malitious enuy of ſome, I haue beene hardly and vnfriendly dealt with, which may ſomewhat extenuate my crime and offence; for——

But as he was enforcing this point further, the Lord Deputy interrupted his ſpeech, and with a fewe words deliuered with great authority, (which in a Marſhalliſt ſtands in ſtead of Eloquence) told him, that there was no excuſe to be heard, his crimes were too great; and thereupon commanded him to depart the Preſence: which he did with a countenance ſeeming very heauy and ſad. The next day departing for Dublin, hee tooke Tir-oen thither, meaning to tranſport him for England, had not the death of the Queene hindered his deſigne. Theſe things premiſed, and Ireland thus recouered that was in hazard to be loſt, let vs returne to our Engliſh affaires, from whence theſe Iriſh bogges haue detained vs too long.

(327) On what tearmes the Earle of Eſſex left Ireland we haue already heard, and to what lamentable ſucceſſe the height of his riſe brought him, is now to bee related; wherein hee may be the example of fortunes daliance, and of the vnſtayed felicity had in this life; a man indeede filled with the affection of his Prince & the people, & fraught with honourable habilities to purchaſe both, vntill by his owne vnaduiſedneſſe (for ſo it muſt needs be cenſured) he clouded his honour, wiſdome, and loyalty, with the ſhadowes of his owne diſcontents. Whether his Soueraignes fauours were the wings of his ambitions, or the dependancies of men of warre, the pillars of his high hopes, I doe not cenſure; but that ſome ſecret vnder-workings gaue fire to his paſſionate diſcontents, I doubt not, hauing ſeene his owne letters penned in that behalfe. Howſoeuer, ſure it is, the Eie of Ielouſie now laſtly attended him, and his doings were more noted, then was made ſhew of: wherefore, being yet in Ireland with an eminent authority, followed with the flower and chiefeſt men of warre, and ſuſpected to be too well reſpected by the Arch-rebell Tir-one, it was held good policy (vpon another pretended occaſion) to muſter forces, and to make a Lord Lieutenant Generall of all England, which was, the right honorable Charles Howard Earle of Nottingham Lord high Admirall.

(328) The ſhew of this preparation was a preuenting prouidence (as was pretended) againſt a Spaniſh Navy in new rigging for the Seas; and indeed ſuch preparation in that Summer was made, as the like had not beene in England ſince Queene Elizabeth came to the Crowne. For London was allotted to furniſh ſixteene Ships to the Seas, and ſix thouſand Souldiers for the Land ſeruice, whereof three thouſand were to reſt euer in a readineſſe, and the other three thouſand (all of them houſeholders) to attend and gard her Maieſties royall Perſon. And out of many Countries adioyning, ſuch numbers of braue horſe and horſemen were gathered, as neuer till then had beene ſeene; the fame whereof was ſo farre ſpred, as neither Spaine, nor any other, could haue any heart to make attempt this way.

(329) But the Earle of Eſſex arriuing in England not onely peaceably, but alſo very priuately and vnaccompanied (as hath beene ſaide) and now remaining in the Lord Keepers cuſtody, was often and ſeriouſly dealt with, by that truly honourable and prouident Statiſt (of whom hee was intirely affected) ſomewhat to decline his lofty ſoaring, leſt in mounting too high, he ſhould melt his waxen wings againſt the hot Sunne, and not to ſuffer the ſore to feſter till it were paſt cure; to which purpoſe alſo he afterward wrote him a letter of pithy and ſapient perſwaſions, out of the abundance of his well-wiſhing heart; the coppy whereof we held worthy to bee heere preſented.

The Lord Keeper to the Earle of Essex Iulie 18. An. 1598.

(330) My very good Lord. It is often ſeene, that a ſtander by ſeeth more then hee that playeth the game; and for the moſt part euery man in his owne cauſe, ſtandeth in his owne light, and ſeeth not ſo cleerely as hee ſhould. Your Lordſhippe hath dealt in other mens cauſes, and in greate and weighty affaires with great wiſdome and iudgement; now your owne is in hand, you are not to contemne or refuſe the aduiſe of any that loueth you, how ſimple ſoeuer. In this order I range my ſelfe; of thoſe that loue you none more ſimple, and none that loueth you with more true and honeſt affection: which ſhall pleade mine excuſe, if you ſhall either miſtake, or miſconſter, my words or meaning; But in your Lordſhips honorable wiſdome I neither doubt nor ſuſpect the one or other. I will not preſume to aduiſe you, but I will ſhoot my bolt, and tell you what I thinke. The beginning and too-long continuing of this vnſeaſonable diſcontent you haue ſeene and prooued, by which you may aime at the end. If you hold ſtill this courſe (which hitherto you finde to bee worſe and worſe, and the longer you goe, the farther out of the way) there is little hope or likelyhood that the end will bee better. You are not yet ſo farre gone, but you may well returne; the returne is ſafe, the progreſſe dangerous and deſperate.

In this courſe you hold, if you haue any enemies, you doe that for them which they could neuer doe for themſelues. Your friends you leaue open to ſcorne and contempt; you forſake your ſelfe, and ouerthrow your fortunes, and ruinate your honour and reputation. You giue that courage and comfort to the forreine enemies, as greater they cannot haue. For what can bee more welcome, or more pleaſing newes vnto them, then to heare that her Maieſty and the Realme are maymed of ſo worthy a member, who hath ſo often and ſo valiantly quelled and daunted them. You forſake your Country, when it hath moſt neede of your counſell or helpe. And laſtly, you faile in that indiſſoluble duty which you owe to your moſt gracious Soueraigne. A duty impoſed vpon you, not by nature or policy onely, but by that religious and ſacred band, wherein the diuine Maieſty of almighty God hath by the rule of Chriſtianitie obliged you.

For the foure firſt, your conſtant reſolution may perhaps moone you to eſteeme them as light; but being well weighed they are not light, nor lightly to bee regarded. And for the two laſt, it may bee that the cleerneſſe of your inward conſcience, may ſeeme to content your ſelfe. But that is not enough; theſe duties ſtand not onely in contemplation, or in inward meditation: their effects be externall action, and when that faileth, the ſubſtance faileth.

This being your preſent ſtate and condition, what is to bee done? what is the remedy? My good Lord I lacke wiſdome and iudgement to aduiſe you; but I will neuer lacke an honeſt true heart to wiſh well, nor (being warranted by a good conſcience) will feare to ſpeake what I thinke.

I haue beginne plainely, bee not offended if I proceede ſo. Bene cedit, qui cedit tempori. Seneca ſaith well, Lex ſi nocentem punit, cedendum eſt iuſtitiæ; ſi innocentem, cedendum eſt fortunæ. The medicine and remedie is, not to contend and ſtriue, but humbly to yeelde and ſubmit. Haue you giuen a cauſe, and yet take a ſcandall vnto you? then all you can doe, is too little to make ſatisfaction. Is cauſe of ſcandall giuen vnto you? yet policy, duty, and religion, enforce you to ſue, yeelde, and ſubmit, to your Soueraigne, betweene whom and you there can bee no proportion of duty. When God requires it as a principall duty and ſeruice to himſelfe; and when it is euident, that great good may enſue of it to your friends, your ſelfe, your Country, and your Soueraigne, and extreame harme by the contrary: there can bee no diſhonour or hurt to yeelde, but in not doing of it, is diſhonour and impiety.

The difficulty (my good Lord) is to conquere your ſelfe, which is the height of true valour and fortitude; whereunto all your honorable actions haue intended. Doe it in this, and God will bee pleaſed, her Maieſtie (I doubt not) well ſatisfied: your Country will take good, and your friends take comfort by it; and your ſelfe (I mention you laſt, for I know that of all theſe, you eſteeme your ſelfe leaſt) ſhall receiue honour, and your enemies (if you haue any) ſhall be diſappointed of their bitter-ſweete hopes.

I haue deliuered what I thinke, ſimply and truly; and leaue you to determine according to your wiſdome. If I haue erred, it is Error amoris, not, Amor erroris. Conſtrue and accept it (I beſeech you) as I meane it; not as an aduiſe, but as an opinion, to bee allowed or cancelled at your pleaſure. If I might conueniently haue conferred with your ſelfe in perſon, I would not haue troubled you with ſo many idle blots. Whatſoeuer you iudge of this mine opinion, yet bee aſſured my deſire is to further all good meanes that may tend to your good, and ſo wiſhing you all honourable happineſſe, I reſt your Lordſhippes moſt ready and faithfull, though vnable, poore friende.

The Earles Anſwere.

(331) My very good Lord. Though there is not the man this day liuing, whom I would ſooner make a Iudge of any queſtion that did concerne mee, then your ſelfe: yet you muſt giue me leaue to tell you, that in ſome caſes I muſt appeale from all earthly Iudges; and if in any, then ſurely in this, where the higheſt Iudge on earth hath impoſed vpon mee the heauieſt puniſhment, without triall or hearing. Since then I muſt either anſwere your Lordſhips arguments, or forſake mine owne iuſt defence, I will forces mine aking head to doe mee ſeruice for an houre.

I muſt firſt deny my diſcouragement, which was forced, to be an humorous diſcontentment, and in that it was vnſeaſonable, and is too long continuing, your Lordſhippe ſhould rather condole with me, then expoſtulate. Naturall ſeaſons are expected here below, but violent and vnſeaſonable ſtormes come from aboue: there is no tempeſt to the paſſionate indignation of a Prince, nor that at any time ſo vnſeaſonable, as when it lighteth on thoſe that might expect an harueſt of their painefull and carefull labours. Hee that is once wounded muſt feele ſmart till his hurt is cured, or the part ſenſeleſſe; but cure I expect none, her Maieſties heart being obdurate; and be without ſenſe I cannot. But then (you ſay) I may aime at the end. I doe more then aime, for I ſee an end of all my fortunes, and haue ſet an end to all my deſires. In this courſe doe I any thing for mine enemies? when I was preſent, I found them abſolute, and therefore I had rather they ſhould triumph alone, then haue mee attendant vpon their Chariot. Or doe I leaue my friends? when I was a Courtier, I could yeeld them no fruit of my loue to them; now I am an Hermite, they ſhall beare no enuie for their loue to me. Or doe I forſake my ſelfe, becauſe I doe enioy my ſelfe? Or doe I ouerthrow my fortunes, becauſe I build not a fortune of paper walles, which euery puffe of winde blowes downe? Or doe I ruinate mine honor becauſe I leaue following the purſuit, or wearing the falſe marke of the ſhadow of honour? Doe I giue courage or comfort to the forraine enemies, becauſe I reſerue my ſelfe to encounter them, or becauſe I keepe mine heart from baſeneſſe, though I cannot keepe my fortune from declining? No, no, I giue euery one of theſe conſiderations his due right, and the more I weigh them, the more I finde my ſelfe iuſtified from offending in any of them. As for the two laſt obiections, that I forſake my Country when it hath moſt need of me, and faile in that indiſſoluble duty which I owe to my Soueraigne: I anſwere, that if my Country had at this time need of my publike ſeruice, her Maieſtie that gouernes it would not haue driuen me to a priuate life.

I am tied to my Country by two bands; one publike, to diſcharge carefully, faithfully, and induſtriouſly, that truſt that is committed vnto me; and the other priuate, to ſacrifice for it my life and carkaſe which haue beene nouriſhed in it. Of the firſt I am free, being diſmiſſed or diſabled by her Maieſty. Of the other, nothing can free me but death, and therefore no occaſion of performance ſhall offer it ſelfe, but I will meete it halfe way. The indiſſoluble duety which I owe to her Maieſty, is the duetie of alleagiance which I will neuer, nor can faile in; the duetie of attendance is no indiſſoluble duety. I owe her Maieſty ſeruice of an Earle, and of a Marſhall of England. I haue beene contented to doe her the ſeruice of a Clerke, but can neuer ſerue her as a villaine, as a ſlaue. But yet (you ſay) I muſt giue way to time: ſo I doe, for now I ſee the ſtorme come, I haue put my ſelfe into the harbour. Seneca ſaith, wee muſt giue way to fortune. I know that fortune is blind and ſtrong, and therefore I goe as farre out of the way as I can. You ſay the remedy is not to ſtriue, I neither ſtriue nor ſeeke for remedy, but I muſt yeeld and ſubmit: I can neuer yeeld my ſelfe to bee guilty, or this impoſition lately laide vpon me, to be iuſt: I owe ſo much to the Author of truth, as I can neuer yeeld truth to be falſhood, or falſhood to be truth. Haue I giuen cauſe (you aske) and take a ſcandall? No, I gaue not cauſe to take vp ſo much as Fimbrius his complaint, for I did totum telum corpore accipere. I patiently beare all, and ſenſibly feele all that I then receiued. When this ſcandall was giuen mee, nay, when the vileſt of all indignities are done vnto mee, doth Religion enforce me to ſerue? doth God require it? is it impiety not to doe it? why? cannot Princes erre? cannot ſubiects receiue wrong? is an earthly power or authority infinite? Pardon me, pardon mee my Lord, I can neuer ſubſcribe to theſe principles: but Salomons foole laughes when he is ſtricken: Let theſe that mean to make their profite by Princes faults, ſhew to haue no feare of Princes iniuries. Let them acknowledge an infinite abſolutenes in earth, that doe not beleeue in an abſolute infinitenes in heauen. As for me, I haue receiued wrong, I feele it, my cauſe is good I know it. And whatſoeuer come, all the powers on earth can neuer ſhew more ſtrength and conſtancy in oppreſſing, then I can ſhew in ſuffering, whatſoeuer ſhall be impoſed vpon me.

Your Lordſhip in the beginning of your letter made your ſelfe a looker on, and mee a player of mine owne game; ſo you may ſee more then I: but you muſt giue mee leaue to tell you in the end of mine, that ſince you but ſee and I ſuffer, I muſt of neceſſity feele more then you. I muſt craue your Lordſhips patience, to giue him that hath a crabbed fortune leaue to vſe a crabbed ſtile. But whatſoeuer my ſtile is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected towards your Lordſhip, then that of your Lordſhips poore friend

R. Essex.

(332) The diſtempered humor diſcouering it ſelfe in this letter, argueth both the depth of his ſetled diſcontent, and the danger of giuing way to violent paſſions, which not onely depriue the wiſeſt of the vſe of their owne vnderſtanding, but alſo blinde their eyes that they cannot ſee, nor apprehend the benefite of other mens faithfull counſels. Notwithſtanding, it pleaſed her gracious Highneſſe (whom he ſo cenſureth as wronging him, for lending a more attentiue eare to his enemies ſuggeſtions, then to his owne ſatisfactions) firſt, to remitte his durance to his owne houſe, and then loth to looke into his faults but with her princely eye of fauour to proceed vnto ſome moderate cenſure of his actions, to the end hee might ſee his owne errors, and ſhee ſo limit his power as her owne might be ſecured. Eſſex comm. ded to his owne houſe.

(333) To which end ſhee aſsigned certain of her Priuy Councell to conuent him concerning the breaking of his former inſtructions for the North-Iriſh proſecution, and the manner of his treating with Tir-Oen, his comming from Ireland, and leauing that Kingdome contrary to her Maieſties expreſſe commandement, ſigned vnder the Royall Hand and Signet. Whereunto his anſwere was, that the State of Warre held it a Maxime, to make good the Stand before the Remoue, and that it was one thing at Table to direct, but another thing in field to effect, eſpecially in Ireland, whoſe war was with Boggs and Woods, aſwell as with Men. And to the reſt of the obiections hee anſwered with ſuch obedient diſcretion, and loyall ſubmiſsion, as hee well ſatisfied the Honourable preſence, onely a ſuſpenſion from the exerciſe of ſome of his Offices was decreed, vntill her Maieſties pleaſure ſhould otherwiſe order it. Shortly after hee was ſet at full liberty; the Queene ſending him word that ſhee well hoped his ſureſt guard would now bee his owne diſcretion. Eſſex ſuſpended from the exerciſe of his offices.

(334) But ſeeing his wonted greatneſſe reſtrained, though the ſcope of his liberty was thus farre enlarged, he preſently mounted higher with the winges of diſcontent: for depriued of Offices, neglected in Court, and all his forraine ſeruices powred into her Maieſties lappe, was now (as he imagined) there wrapped vp, and laide in obliuion. Neither were theſe his grieuances leſſened by his military followers, who dayly watred theſe ill ſet plants with their exaſperated complaints, till they were ſprung to ſome height, and ſtill to nouriſh their ſappe, many proiects were caſt, and conferences held how to lop off other branches, which as they feared would hinder their growth, til laſtly, at Drury houſe they agreed on the manner (O had it withered before it had blowmed, or died in the graffing before it tooke ſappe) which was by violent hand to bring the Earle into her Maieſties preſence, and to remoue from her ſuch as they deemed his oppoſites. The conference at Drury houſe.

(335) The frequent aſſembly vnto Eſſex houſe by Noblemen, Knights, Captaines, and others, was preſently obſerued by the Statiſts in Court, to ſtoppe the current of which confluence before it grew to a floud, Secretary Herbert was ſent from her Maiſty to require him to repaire before the Lords of her Councell, then aſſembled at Salisbury Court, which hee excuſing with ſickneſſe, neglected to do, and the ſame night vpon ſome ſiniſter reports ſet set a double watch about him, pretending some danger to bee meant to his person. For whose defence the next morning (being Sunday) many repaired vnto his house, among whom, as chiefe were the Earles of Rutland and Southampton, the Lord Sandes and Monteagle, accompanied with a Troupe of gallant Gentlemen their followers.

Feb. 8.

(336) Her Maiesty hearing of these disorderlie proceedings, in her princely wisdome thought to cast water vpon this begunne fire, before it brake forth into flame, and thereupon sent foure men of much honour vnto his place, to offer him iustice for any griefes, and to command the assembly to depart. The persons sent were the L. Keeper of the great Seale, the Earle of Worcester, Sir Francis Knowles his vncle, and the Lord Chiefe Iustice of England, all of them in high honour and fauour with the Earle himselfe.

The Queen sendeth foure of her Councell vnto the Earle of Essex.

(337) These comming to his house without Temple-barre, were receiued in themselues, but scarse any of their seruants suffered to follow, excepting the Bearer of the Purse and Seale, where finding the Court full of those his followers, the Lord Keeper putting off his hatte, tolde them that they were sent by her Maiesty to vnderstand the cause of this their assembly, and to let them know, that if they had any particular cause of griefe against any person whatsoeuer, they should haue hearing and iustice. The Earle of Essex answered that his life was sought after, and that hee had beene perfidiously dealt withall. To which the Lord Chiefe Iustice replyed, that if any such matter was attempted, it was fitte for him to declare it, assuring him of a faithfull relation, and that her Maiesty would doe him iustice. Which promises the Lord Keeper seconded, and desired the Earle to declare his griefes, if not openly, yet in priuate, and he doubted not but to procure him full satisfaction, & then turning towards the multitude, with a louder voice said; I do command you all vpon your alleageance to lay down your Weapons, and to depart. Whereupon the Earle himselfe went into his Booke-chamber, these foure Councellors following him in hope of priuate conference; but so farre off was hee from hearing them further, or answering to their demands, that leauing them there vnder sure custody, hee returned to his other attendants.

The Earles answere.

A.D. 1600. Sunday, Feb. 8.

(338) With whom in tumultuous manner, hee made into London, his followers crying, that the Earle of Essex should haue beene murthered by Cobham, Cecill and Rawley, all men amased what this did meane. Thus past he from Ludgate through Cheapeside, into Fan-church street, where hee entred the house of a * supposed friend (then one of the Shiriffes) who seeing the multitude, auoided himselfe out at a backe-dore, when presently in diuers parts of the City Essex was proclaimed a Traitor, to the no lesse griefe of the Citizens, then feares of his followers, and thence returning with a Halbert in his hand, and a Table-napkin about his necke, came into Gracious street, where a while hee made his stand, (the Lord Maior and others being assembled at the vpper end towards Leaden-hall) no one Citizen or seruant shewing him any signe of assistance. The ease so desperate, one of the principall offenders contriued how by redeeming his fault, to saue his owne life; who hastening into the Strand to Essex-house, and comming to Sir Iohn Dauis, as being sent from the Earle, gat release of the foure Counsellors, vnder whose guard they had beene hitherto kept.

Essex entreth into London.

Thom. Smith.

F. G.

(339) Essex now dispairing of all succours in London, saw it was booteless there to make his abode, & therefore retired againe towards Paules, meaning to passe Ludgate the way that he came, but being resisted by a company of Pikemen, and other forces, made by that stout and noble Prelate, the then Lord Bishoppe of London, hee was put backe, Sir Christopher Blunt sore hurt, and young Tracy slaine; besides some others on the Queenes part, himselfe narrowly escaping, being thrust through the hatte with a pyke. So hence againe returning, at Queene Hiue hee tooke boate, bidding the City and his fortunes adue.

He returneth, & is forced from Ludgate.

Taketh boat and fortifieth his house in Strand.

(340) His enterprise thus frustrate, with a mind distracted hee rowed vp the riuer, and landed at the Water-gate of his owne house; which hee presently fortified; and the Lord Admirall assaulted; suffering notwithstanding the Countesse of Essex, the Lady Rich and their Gentlewomen to depart; which done, hee forced the Garden euen to the walles of the house. Some resistance was made, and some persons slaine vpon either part, which the Earle perceiuing, presently yeelded, desiring onely that hee might bee ciuilly vsed, and that hee might haue an honourable triall; and so being first brought to Lambeth-house, where an howre or two he remained with the Lord Archbishoppe (his euer most louing, but then most mournefull friend) was thence with some other Lords and Gentlemen conuaied by water to the Tower, about tenne of the clocke the same night: hauing then experience, that vaine is the loue of the Commons to a Subiect (how great soeuer) when it is counterballanced with the dutiful obedience vnto their Prince.

(341) Vpon the nineteenth of the same moneth, the Earle of Essex and Southampton were arraigned at Westminster, the Lord Buckhurst Lord high Treasurer of England beeing made Lord Steward for the day, where the great resolution of the one, contemning death, and the sweet temper of the other well deseruing life, did breed most compassionate affections in all men, hearing the sentence of law to passe vpon them. The one of them remained prisoner in the Tower during the raigne of the Queene, and by the gracious clemency of our Soueraigne Lord King Iames at his comming to the Crowne, had pardon of life, and restauration of bloud, the other (Essex) the fiue and twentith of February being Ashwednesday, suffered vpon the Greene within the Tower, rendring his soule to God with a most penitent and Christian constancie, whose last speeches were to this effect.

Essex arraigned and condemned.

Is executed.

(342) "My Lords and Christian brethren, who "are present witnesses of my iust punishment, I "confesse (to Gods glory) my selfe a most wret- "ched sinner, and that my sinnes in number ex- "ceed the haires of my head; that good which I "would haue done, that did I not, and the euill "which I would not, that did I. For all which I "beseech my Sauiour Christ to bee a Mediator to "his Father my God, especially for this my last "sinne, this great, this crying, this bloudy, this "infectious sinne, wherein, through loue of mee, "so many haue beene drawen to offend God, their "Soueraigne, and the world. I beseech God, her "Maiesty, and the State, to forgiue vs; and I be- "seech him to blesse her with a prosperous raigne, "with a wise and vnderstanding heart, to blesse the "Nobles and Ministers of the Church and State. "I likewise beseech you, and all the world, to hold "a charitable opinion of mee, for my intention "towards her Maiesty, whose death (I protest) "I neuer meant, nor any violence towards her Per- "son. I thanke God, I neuer was Atheist, in not "beleeuing the Scriptures: neither Papist, trusting "in my owne merits; but am assured to bee saued "by the mercies and merits of Christ Iesus my "Sauiour. This faith I was brought vp in, and "heerein I am now ready to dye; beseeching you "all to ioyne your soules with mee in praier, that "my soule may bee lifted vp by faith, aboue all "earthly things; and first I desire forgiuenesse of "all the world, euen as freely, as from my heart I "forgiue all the world.

His speech at death.

(343) And then kneeling downe saide, I haue beene diuers times in places of danger, where death was neither so present nor so certaine, and yet euen then I felt the weaknesse of my flesh, and therefore now in this last and great conflict, I desire Gods assiſtance by his preſeruing Spirit. And ſo with *a moſt heauenly praier, and faithfull conſtancy, (as if his ſoule were then already in heauenly fruition) hee humbled himſelfe to the blocke, and ſpreading abroad his armes (the ſigne that he had giuen to his headſ-man) his head was with three ſtrokes of the Axe ſeuered rom his body, to the great heauineſſe of all men, appearing as well by their countenances, as ſpleene againſt his Executioner, who was in danger of his life at his returne, had not the Sheriffes aſſiſted him to his home.

Others executed

(344) For acceſſaries and chiefe Counſelors in this offence, died at Tyborne, Sir Gilliam Merricke Knight, and Henry Cuffe (for his exquiſite learning much bewailed of all men) and fiue daies after them, vpon the Scaffold on Tower Hill, were beheaded Sir Charles Dauers and Sir Chriſtopher Blunt Knights. And before any of theſe, Thomas Lee a Captaine was executed, for words ſpoken touching the Earle of Eſſex his deliuerance, to mooue, or rather to inforce the Queene thereunto, as his words were conſtrued, who neuertheleſſe confidently tooke his death, that hee neuer had thought of any violent attempt.

The griefe conceiued for the Earle of Eſſex his death.

(345) As the death of this Noble-man was much lamented by the ſubiects, (whoſe loue towards him was ſo ingrafted, as I thinke, I may well ſay, neuer ſubiect had more,) ſo her Maieſty likewiſe, hauing ſuch a Starre fallen from her firmament, was inwardly mooued, and outwardly oftentimes would ſhew paſſions of her griefe, euen till the time of her approching end, when two yeeres after ſhee laide downe her Head in the Graue, as the moſt reſplendent Sunne ſetteth at laſt in a Weſterne cloud.

A briefe ſhadow of Queene Elizabeths due praiſes.

(346) The ſtate of which Great Queene throughout the whole courſe of her moſt flouriſhing raigne, was (as in part you haue ſeene ſhadowed already) ſo beautified and ſtrengthened with all honorable perfections, both of Peace, and Warre, as neuer any Monarch raigned with greater obſeruance of her owne, nor ruled with a more obſerued magnanimity toward forraine Nations: inſomuch, as if her incomparable vertues and praiſes were truly and exactly deſcribed (a worke worthy ſome noble ſpirit and penne) wee are verily perſwaded, that future ages will ſomewhat ſtagger and doubt, whether ſuch celebration of her, were not rather affectionately Poeticall, then faithfully Hiſtoricall.

Her ſway and eſteemation in forraine Counties.

(347) For, the great affaires of Europe mainely depended vpon her directions, who ſitting at the Helme of the Shippe (as Fronto ſpake of Antoninus the Emperour) arbitrated and guided their Eſtates both in peace and warre: Spaine, ſeeking to ouerflow all, was beaten backe, and ſcarcely able to maintaine her owne bankes: In France, the houſe of Valoys vnder-propped by her counſell; that of Bourbons, aduanced by her countenance, forces, and treaſure; Scotland releeued by her loue; Neatherlands by her power; Portingals King by her bounty; Poland by her commiſeration; likewiſe Germany, Denmarke, Sueueland, often tooke vp and laide downe Armes at her becke and diſpoſe. Neither could the vtmoſt bounds of Europe, (the Ruſsians and Tartars) containe the limits and extent of her great fame; but that the ſame pierced further into the remoter parts of Aſia, Africa, America, among the Turkes, (whoſe great Emperour, in honour of ſo great a Mediatreſſe, granted peace vnto the Polomans outworne with warres,) among the Perſians, Barbarians, Indians, and where not? In moſt of whoſe Dominions to the great enriching of her Kingdome, ſhee ſetled commerce for encreaſe of merchandize, and got large priuiledges for encouragement of her Merchants, whom ſhe cheriſhed as a moſt neceſſary and important part of her Weale Publike.

Her Princely qualities.

(348) Who, for her royall actions and Princely qualities of Minde (ſeated alſo in ſuch a Body as for ſtate, ſtature, beauty, and Maieſty, beſt befitted an Empreſſe,) may be ſingled out for an Idea of an abſolute Prince, her Sex onely excepted, which yet made her vertues more remarkable, as beeing (and ſo reputed by Strangers) of all the Princes of her time, the moſt exact obſeruer (both for Action and Ceremony,) of true Regall deportment and magnificence. For her enterprizes as fortunate as Caſar, for life, loue, wiſdome, and magnanimity, another Auguſtus; by her peaceable raigne ſhutting the Temple of Warre in England (whiles all Nations round about her felt the miſeries of warre) as hee did the doores of Ianus in Rome. And yet had ſhee Warriers like vnto the Worthies of Dauid; her forraine imployments, Nauigations, and Diſcoueries, hauing bred ſuch numbers of moſt renowned Captaines, both for Sea and Land, as none of our former Princes hath ſeene the like. With which neceſſary kinde of noble Seruitors, that her owne Kingdome might bee alwaies munified (as foreſeeing the vncertainties and ſudden changes in the Peace-pretending amities of forraine Princes,) ſhee euer imploied many of her Gentry and others, in the warres of Princes abroad, ſo to perfect them for all occurrents of their Country at home; which alſo induced her (ſome Statiſts haue thought) to ſuffer that long lingring protraction of her Iriſh warres, the rather, to keepe in vre and exerciſe, the skill and valour of her Engliſh. By which meanes, the ſpreading fame and * extent of her Empire was ſuch, that ſhee might ſeeme a ſecond Traian, who laide the circuite of the Romans the largeſt; hauing not onely ſo powerfull a Nauy ſtill in readineſſe, as whereby ſhee attained the Soueraignety of the Sea, but ſo famous Sea-men alſo, as that, vnder her auſpicious Raigne, * twice was the whole Globe of the Terreſtriall World ſailed round about.

(349) Neither leſſe was her renowne for thoſe other vertues which are the attendants of Peace; her Clemency, Iuſtice, and * Temperance: touching the laſt of which, as in one kind (of her diet and priuate life,) King Edward her brother vſually called her, his Lady Temper: ſo of another kinde of temperance in this learnedeſt of Queenes, the * learneſt of Kings hath giuen this memorable teſtimony, that when as France (part of her Royall Title) was in ciuill warres, Spaine (her mortall Enemie) enfeebled both in power and purſe, Netherland ambitious of her gouernment, and Scotland ruled by an Infant, yet in ſuch abundance both of meanes, opportunities, and prouocations, ſo ſuperabundant was her moderation and temper, that ſhee euer religiouſly abſteined from all ambitious deſire of encrochment, on the rights or territories of any her neighbour Princes. Beeing in this, and thoſe other her vertuous actions, ſuch, as of whom that which was ſpoken of Antoninus Pius may more truly bee verified, that ſcarcely, in youth ſhee did any thing raſhly, or in her age indiſcreetly; ſcarcely, I ſay: for as a Creature, wee cannot exempt her from all frailties, as a Woman, from paſſions, or as a Prince, from all errors, whereinto, euen againſt her owne naturall inclination, ſhe might be drawen, either on miſinformation, or on opinion of neceſſity in the State. For her Court, it was not onely a frequent Academie, of as Honourable Councellors, Illuſtrious Peeres, Gallant Courtiers, Learned Profeſſors, Intelligent Statiſts, as euer attended any Chriſtian Prince; but alſo a Nurſery, where yongue Nobles and others might bee trained vp to the managing of greateſt affaires, and a Sanctuary where the meaneſt might finde releeſe againſt the mightieſt; becauſe as the Wiſeſt in her Counſell were content to learne wiſdome from her directions, ſo the Greateſt were drawen to practiſe Equity, both by her example and command. Yea, which is more admirable in her Sex, ſo reſerued was ſhee from giuing any man too-much intereſt, or being lead and ouerſwaied by any of her Great-ones about her, that they all ſtood in a reuerent awe of her very preſence and aſpect; but much more of her leaſt frowne or checke, wherewith ſome of them, who who thought they might best presume of her fauor, haue bene so suddenly daunted and Planet-stricken, that they could not lay downe their griefe thereof but in their graues. A thing so much the stranger, considering otherwise her incomparable meekenesse and gracious countenance and demeanours towards her people, who neuer satiated with her sight and presence, were no otherwise affected with ioy and wondering thereat, (though they beheld her neuer so often) then if they had beheld some Angelicall creature.

(350) These Soueraigne Arts of Maiesticall rule, were maruellously polished and perfected by her exquisite learning, and insight in the Arts Liberall: for which if the Emperour Hadrian bee so highly commended, much more must this learned Empresse, who further to perfect her solid knowledge, read euery Author in his owne Originall, and answered most Nations Ambassadours in their owne languages. Yea, so farre was shee deuoted to learning and the professors thereof, that in honour of it, and them, shee purposely went to the Vniuersity of Oxford twice, and once to Cambridge, at each time there spending many whole daies together, at the Academicall Exercises, and disputations of their chiefest learned men in all faculties. In both which noble Academies, shee left not onely the deare remembrances of her gracious loue, deliuered to them publikely in her Princely and Eloquent Orations, but much more testified in her Princely bounty, by enacting a law for the doubling (almost) of the yeerely reuenewes of all their noble foundations. Thus spent shee her time & cares in cherishing wisdome in others, and like Sabaes Queene seeking to encrease it in her selfe, esteeming a day spent otherwise (as Titus was wont to say of himselfe) quite lost. For which purpose euery day all other affaires laide away, shee set apart some howres, either to reade, or heare her learned Readers; one of which number, (a * man of excellent learning) professed, that her Instructers as oft as they came to her presence about such employments, receiued such admirable documents from her, that they seemed rather to learne of her, then to bring learning to her; and that the learnedest Authors, as Diuine Plato, and the like, were made more diuine by the learned Commentaries which shee wrote vpon them. In which respects, both of noble actions and arts, well may she bee paralelled with that euer-renowned Zenobia, who hauing both perfectly read the Roman Story in Greek, and also herselfe abridged the Alexandrian, and all the Orientall history, thereby attained to so high a pitch of wisdome and authority, that shee not onely insulted vpon the Romans, but held the Arabians, Sarazens, Armenians, and other fierce and intractable people in such obedience, that they neuer durst stirre against her.

(351) But amongst her volumes (which were very many and choisest) the Booke of God was first in her esteeme, nor last in her readings: the pious fruites whereof shined brightly throughout the whole course aswell of her priuate life, as publike actions. In her Priuate; Piety, Sobriety, Purity, Charity, and Chastity (maugre the venemous tongues of all Hell-borne Slanderers) were her vnseparable Companions, neuer suffering any Lady to approch her sacred presence, of whose staine she had but the least suspition. For the Publike, the distressed shee releeued, the oppressed shee succoured, the ouer-borne Princes shee aided, the proud shee amated, and alwayes ouermastered to her lasting memory, and Englands glory. But most especially shined her zeale to God (on whose onely Prouidence and reflexe of her owne vnstained Conscience, shee reposed against all affronts of the world) in preseruing his true Church and worship, both from the pollutions of Idolatry, and frenzies of Nouelists; her Kingdome being a receptacle, and Court a Sanctuary for the banished Protestants; as was the Pallace of Constantius (the husband of our Helena) for the persecuted Christians, when hee sate Emperour of the West in this Iland of Britaine. Whereby as in her life time shee attained to be * styled by forraine Churches; so at her death was shee by them generally lamented, as the Nursing mother of the French, Dutch, Italian, Exiles for Christs name, & the vnconquered Defendaresse of the whole true Christian Religion.

(352) Thus shee liued, raigned, and dyed, in Peace, and full of glorie, celebrated by the tongues and pennes of the rarest spirits of all Nations (yea euen enemies) of her time: till lastly the God of Peace called her to a farre higher glory, by his vnpartiall messenger death, who seized on her at her Manour of Richmond. Her sickenesse was accompanied with a deepe melancholy, wherein, as shee gaue signes of death vnto the learned Physitians, so great assurance of her eternall life, vnto all the worthy Prelates emploied about her: manifesting (euen when silence oppressed her tongue) by liuely signes at their praiers and speeches, how she reioyced with the Apostle, that she had fought a good fight, finished her course, and kept the faith, hoping for the Crowne of righteousnesse, that the Lord the righteous Iudge had laid vp for her against that great day. And so her Soule departed this flesh (the earthen vessell wherein so many heauenly endowments had beene treasured) beeing borne vp by the Angels vnto the fruitions of endlesse blisse, the twentie fourth of March, the yeere of Saluation 1602. of her owne age, sixty nine, sixe moneths, and seuenteene daies, and of her glorious Raigne the fourty fourth yeere, foure moneths, and seuenth day; as well beloued and as much lamented as euer was Prince; admired, fauoured, and feared, as the worlds wonder and heauens darling: being the last in order of those Monarchs who had long raigned ouer the South-part of this Island, and the greatest in fame that euer ruled before her, as if all their vertues had made a confluence in her, that so glorious a Monarchy might not haue end but with so glorious a period.

CHAPTER I.

A.D. 1602.

BEfore the conceiued ſorrowes, for the death of the late renowned Queen could fully be diſſolued into teares, or thoſe get paſſage from the heart to the eyes, the conduit was ſtopped with a ſodaine ioy, and all faces cleared, before that ſad penſiueneſſe had therein ſet her full print. The ſtate of England ſtãding that day, like vnto that of Iudahs, wherin the foundation of the ſecond Temple was laid, whoſe ancient men mourned, as doubting the glory thereof could not be anſwerable to that of Salomons; but as they were comforted by a Prophet from God, THAT THE GLORIE OF THE LATER SHOVLD SVRMOVNT THE FORMER, ſo all Engliſh hearts by a diuine bleſſing from God were preſently chered, when they ſaw their morning ſtarre ariſe in the North, whoſe

Pole with His attractiue power, long before had drawne the Needle of the Southerne Compasse vnto that One point.

March 24. (2) Immediately vpon the death of the Queene, the Lords of the Land gaue full satisfaction vnto the people, in proclaiming IAMES THE SIXT, King of Scotland, by the name of IAMES THE FIRST KING OF ENGLAND, FRANCE AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH &c. to the vnspeakeable comfort of all true English, aswell for his vnquestionable claime, as for that hee professed the same true Religion (whose preseruation was their tender care) as also for his singular learning and experience, whereby hee was accomplished to vndergoe the managing of so great an Empire, hauing now attained to thirty sixe yeeres, nine monethes, and fiue dayes, exercised altogether in the practise of Kingly gouernement, from the very first dayes of his infancy.

King Iames proclaimed.

King Iames his iust title to the Crowne of England.

(3) That his Title was most iust, no man can deny, being sprung from the vnited Roses of Lancaster and Yorke, King Henry the seuenth, and Queene Elizabeth his wife: whose Issue by the Male failing in the late deceased Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory, the offspring of Margaret their eldest daughter, was the next heire, which Lady married vnto Iames the fourth King of Scotland; by him had issue King Iames the fift, whose onely Daughter Queene Mary was Mother of this our mighty Monarch. Let Doleman therfore dote vpon his own dreames, and other like Traitors fashion their barres vpon the Popes forge; yet hath God & his right set him on the throne of his most lawfull inheritance, so to vnite the two Crowns into one: Gods omnipotent arme bringing at last that to passe, which had often beene assayed, but could not bee effected by any power of man. For, did not Edward our first, the terror of Syria, and Edward the sixt our godly Iosias, both of them distresse Scotland with their warres, only to haue made an vnion by the marriages of the next neire, and of their Queene? But the time being not come, and all other preceeding Princes failing of their purposes, the peaceable vnion of those two Kingdomes, England and Scotland, as also of two other, France and Ireland was reserued for Him, who is a patterne of all princely Learning and Piety, vnto all other Monarches vppon the surface of the Earth.

King Iames appointed by God to vnite the two kingdomes.

The Romanists hopes for a toleration in Religion.

(4) But these calme proceedings without any oppugnancy, as they were most ioyfull to the English, so were they admirable vnto other forraine Nations, yea, and enuied at of some, especially, such as hoped for an alteration, or at leastwise a toleration of Religion. And so much the rather, for that Pope Clement the eight, had sent the yeere before vnto Henry Garnet, Superiour of the Iesuites in England, two Bulles to the contrary; one to the Clergy, and the other to the Laitie. The title of the former was, Dilectis filijs Archipresbytero, & reliquo Clero Anglicano, &c. the later, Dilectis filijs, Principibus, & Nobilibus, Catholicis Anglicanis, salutem & Apostolicam Benedictionem: the summe of both thus. To our beloued sonnes, the Archpriest and the Clergy, the Peeres and Nobles, Catholikes of England, greeting, and Apostolicall Benediction, &c. The tenor was, that after the death of her Maiesty, whether by course of Nature, or otherwise: Whosoeuer should lay claime or title to the Crowne of England, though neuer so directly, and neerely interessed by discent, should not be admitted vnto the throne, vnlesse he would first tolerate the Romish Religion, and by all his best endeuours promote the Catholike cause, vnto which, by a solemne and sacred Oath, hee should religiously subscribe, after the death of that Miserable woman, for so it pleased his Holinesse to tearme Elizabeth, that most great and happy Queen. By vertue of which Buls, (if vertue may be in any such vicious Libels) the Iesuites diswaded the Romish-minded Subiects from yeelding (in any wise) obedience vnto King Iames, as being not an obedient Catholike sonne; but this not working to their wished effect, and He now solemnly proclaimed with an vniuersall applause, loue and peace, their hopes beganne to grow cold, and no succours from Spaine being now to bee expected, Garnet the Superiour to auoid further dangers, sacrificed these hunger-starued Buls to Vulcan the fiery God.

Ex Libro Inscript. Proceedings against Traitors.

The Popes Buls sent to Garnet to probibite succession, vnlesse he were a Catholike.

Christ would not be Iudge of the inheritance betwixt Brethren: his Vicar will against all right.

(5) King Iames in Scotland receiuing intelligence of the most plausible passages to this enlargement of his Stile and Dominions, prepared himselfe hitherward, and vpon the sixt of Aprill came to Barwicke, thence to Wytherington, Newcastle, Durham, York, Doncaster, Newarke, Burleigh, Roiston, Theobalds, and thence to London vpon the seuenth of May. In all which places hee was most royally and ioyously receiued, with all demonstrations of truest loyalty, loue and obedience, which was no lesse benignely accepted of by his Maiesty, who the better to manifest his royall disposition, in all such places as hee came, where Gaioles for offenders were kept, out of his clemency most graciously set free the Prisoners, (those onely excepted, who lay for treason, murther, or Romish disloyalty) disbursing also large summes of money for release of many others from their creditors.

A.D. 1603. King Iames commeth to London.

His progresse and places of entertainment.

His mercy extended to the prisoners.

(6) In all which progresse, admirable was the confluence of people, which with haste to meete him, seemed rather to flie then to runne, and such were their shoutes of ioy, that the hils resounded the Eccho thereof, euen vp to the heauens, which had beene so propitious, as to bestow on them so good a King, which most abundantly appeared the day that his Maiesty remoued from Theobalds to London, when at Stanford-hill, neer vnto Totnam-high Crosse in Middlesex, the City of London (represented in the Lord Maior, the Aldermen, with fiue hundred choice Citizens, all in chaines of gold; & very well mounted) met his Maiesty, and with all solemne obseruance attended Him vnto the Charterhouse neere Smithfield, which was most sumptuously furnished for his royall entertainement. On which very day, a Proclamation came forth against all griping Monopolies that hindred commerce, and Protections that stopped the due proceedings of law, as also against other abuses in other inferiour carriages. All which were so acceptable to the People and Common-wealth (which had beene too much eaten-out with such Locusts & Caterpillers) as neuer any King wanne himselfe more loue: these being accepted as the auspicious beginnings, promising most happie sequels. So that His entrance was as another Constantine, whose person euery man prayed for, and desired to see: and for Peace another Octauius, hauing ruled peaceably a stout stirring Nation, euen from his yonger yeeres, and liued in peace with all the Princes and Kings of the earth: in which peace now lastly hee brought the Crown and Kingdome of Scotland to augment the glory, circuit and strength of this Realme of England, in whose vnited body, as a faire branched tree, euen at the first hee beganne to engraft the Syences of his princely vertues, which by the sappe and Sunne-shine of his iust gouernement still spredde more and more, like vnto the Cedars that grow vpon Lebanon.

The ioy that was conceiued at the sight of his Maiesty.

His Maiesties comming to London.

His Maiesties first proceeding to maintaine law and commerce.

(7) The English Empire thus peaceably established, both by, and vnto, this peaceable Monarch: from sundry forraine Princes were sent Ambassadors, to congratulate his entrance; as namely, from the Pals-graue of the Rheine, one of the Princes Electors for the Emperour of the Romans: from the French King, Mounsier de Rosny, Great Treasurer of France: from the Spanish King, Don Iohn de Tassis: from the States of Holland and Zeland: from the Archduke of Austria: from the Seigniory of Venice: from the Duke of Florence, and from others.

Diuers Ambassadors came into England to congratulate his entrance.

(8) But among all new-commers, none was more admired nor gazed on, then was Hugh Oneal, Earle of Tir-oen, that perfidious, (but very valiant) subtle ſubtle, and ſmooth-tongued Traitor, and Bonterſes of Ireland, that had beene the death of many a worthy man; who hauing (as wee haue ſhewed) yeelded himſelfe to the Lord Generall Mountioy in the ſickeneſſe of the late Queene, was now by him brought vnto Englands Court, to the Generals great honour, and Tir-oens great good, if hee could haue had grace to conteine himſelfe. For not onely was he taken vpon his lowly ſubmiſſion into fauour with his dread Soueraigne, and reſtored to his former eſtate and dignity, (a very great fauour to ſo great an offender) but a Proclamation was alſo made in his behalfe, and for his ſecurity, that hee ſhould of all men bee honourably vſed (a grace, ſeldome ſhewed a Traitor) becauſe as it ſeemed, his guilty conſcience ſurcharged with bloud, feared the hand of euery man that beheld his face; and indeed many a woman, enraged for loſſe of their husbands or ſonnes, furiouſly deſired and aſſayed to quench their hatred with his bloud: in which perplexity wee will leaue him for a reſtleſſe Rebell, who laſtly like a fugitiue left againe both his loyalty and his owne Country.

(9) In the meane while the ſolemnities for the Coronation were prepared, and many ſtately Trophies (no leſſe due to the conſeruation of Peace, then to the atchieuings of Warre) in London ſtreets ſet vp, which by reaſon of the great ſickneſſe in that Citie then cruelly raging, ſtood a long time rather like the ruines of ſome old decay, then the Princely Pageants of a new Triumph. For before the appointed day of Coronation (which was the twenty fifth of Iuly beeing the feaſt day of Saint Iames the Apoſtle) a Proclamation came forth, that no Londoner ſhould preſume to approch to the Court, the City hauing buried that weeke aboue a thouſand of the plague. But yet a greater plague to the Land then this, was intended ſome weekes before, had not the prouidence of a good God preuented the deſignes of mercileſſe men. For, certaine Italianated Prieſts, boyling in reuengefull rancor, becauſe their plots and hopes (which they vainely promiſed themſelues for aduancement of their Religion) were now paſt all appearance of poſſibility or ſucceſſe, and combining with ſome other of better Ranke and Note, whom priuate diſcontents had whetted on to a publike miſchiefe; contriued together a deſperate deſigne, for ſurprize of the Kings Perſon and Prince Henry his ſonne. Of forces to effect it, they made no doubt, meaning to retaine them priſoners in the Tower, and with the Treaſures therein to mainetaine their intent, or, if the Tower were impugnable, then to carry them to Douer Caſtle, and there by violence either to obtaine their owne pardons, a toleration in Religion, and a remoouall of ſome Counſellors of the State, or elſe to put ſome further proiect in execution. To conceale this Treaſon, Watſon the Prieſt deuiſed Oaths for ſecrecy, and himſelfe with Clarke (another Prieſt alſo) taught, that the act was lawfull, beeing done before the Coronation, for that the King was no King, before he was annointed, and the Crowne ſolemnely ſet on his head.

(10) The other perſons whoſe loyalty was likewiſe called into queſtion, as inuolued in the attempt, were Henry Brooke Lord Cobham and Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Thomas Lord Gray of Wilton, Sir Walter Raughley Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Sir Griffin Markham, and Sir Edward Parham knights, George Brooke, and Bartholmew Brooksby Eſquires, and Anthony Copley a Gentleman; all which parties beeing apprehended, were committed ſome to the Gatehouſe at Weſtminſter, others to the Tower of London. Meane while (notwithſtanding the raging ſickneſſe) the day for the Coronation (being the feaſt of Saint Iames) was celebriouſly kept, with all ſolemne performance and ancient Rites of the Engliſh Kings, in the Collegiate Church of St. Peter in Weſtminſter. Where, the antique Regall Chaire of inthronization, did bleſſedly receiue, with the perſon of his Maieſty, the full accompliſhment alſo of that Prophetical prediction of this Hiu comming to the Crowne, which Antiquity hath recorded to haue beene therein inſcribed thus.

Ni fallat Fatum Scoti hunc quocunq; locatum

If Fates goe right, this Stone, where e're 'tis pight,
The Scot ſhall find, and there his Raigne aſsign'd.

The Regall Chaire brought out of Scotland, wherin is a ſtone called Saxum Iacobi, ſaid to be of high eſteeme with the Scots.

For euen there now the ſacred Oile was powred vpon the royall Perſons of King Iames and Queene Anne, by the moſt reuerend Prelate, Iohn Whitgift Lord Arch-Biſhoppe of Canterbury, the Princeſſe and Peeres wearing their Robes and Coronets, the Officers giuing attendance in their places, and the Lord Maior of London in a Gowne of Crimſon Veluet, with the Aldermen in Scarlet: twelue principall Citizens were admitted to attend them, all other forbidden becauſe of the plague.

(11) As the great ſolitude of the City of London by reaſon of this infection, and the retiredneſſe both of his Maieſty and all his Nobles, gaue ſome hopes to the fore-mentioned Prieſts and their Abettors, for the eaſier accompliſhing their plots: ſo was it alſo ſome occaſion of the delay of Iuſtice on them after their treaſonous deſignes were now fully brought to light. Wherefore, London continuing ſtill vnfit for ſuch a triall, and requiſite concourſe of Peeres and people, Wincheſter, the Tearme beeing there kept, was the place deſigned for their arraignement, whither they were all conueyed vnder ſtrong gard. The firſt who there * came to their triall, were George Brooke, brother to the Lord Cobham, Sir Griffith Markham, and Sir Edward Parham, Brooksby, Copley, Watſon, and Clarke; whoſe inditement was, that they had conſpired; firſt, to deſtroy the King, ſecondly, to raiſe Rebellion; thirdly, to alter Religion; fourthly, to ſubuert the State; and laſtly, to procure forreine Inuaſion. That theſe their intents they had made knowne vnto the Lord Gray, whom they meant ſhould haue bene Earle Marſhall of England, Watſon Lord Chancellor, George Brooke Lord Treaſurer, and Sir Griffin Markham Secretary. That with the King, the Lords alſo ſhould be ſurprized in their chambers at Greenwich, and the Lord Maior and Aldermen of London ſhould bee ſent for, and ſo be ſhut vp in the Tower.

Their Inditements and condemnations.

(12) George Brooke heereunto anſwered (with a colour and pretext as leude as the attempt,) that he had Commiſſion from the King to doe what hee did, onely to try faithfull Subiects; which commiſſion hee could not produce. Sir Griffin Markham (excepting onely the imputation of bloud) confeſſed his offence very penitently, alledging it was through a diſcontented mind, and deſired the Lords to bee a meane to the King for mercy. Watſon and Clark (the former of which confeſſed he had drawen all thoſe Gentlemen into theſe plots) did vainely and ignorantly auerre, that they held the King no King, vntill hee was Crowned, and that therefore it could not be Treaſon: alledging, that Saul was not King vntill he was choſen in Mizpeh, though he had beene annointed in Ramah by Samuell the Prophet; neither Ieroboam, who in the daies of Saleman, had beene confirmed by the Prophet to raigne ouer Iſrael, vntill the people made him King vpon the fooliſh anſweres of Rehoboam. Thus theſe great Rabbies made no difference betwixt the mediate and ordinary ſucceſſion of lawfull Princes, ordeined by God to be his Vice-gerents in fully-eſtabliſhed Common-weales, and thoſe Kings which himſelfe extraordinarilie aduanced, and erected to be the whips in his hand; as the firſt manifeſtly proued, when they had caſt off Samuel, and the latter allotted to no other end, as by the Prophet is apparent, where God in him ſaith, I gaue them a King in mine anger, and I tooke

Sir Walter Raughley arraigned and condemned.

(13) Two daies after was Sir Walter Raughley brought to the Barre, beeing indited for combining with the Lord Cobham (his accuſer) in the foreſaid deſignes. Whereunto he pleaded not guilty, and ſo ſtood for his purgation, as he held argument from morning till night, to the hearers no little admiration, that a man of ſo exquiſite vnderſtanding and experience ſhould giue conſent vnto ſuch a plot, no leſſe foule, then fooliſh. Yet in fine hee was found guilty, and had ſentence of death.

The Lords Cobham and Gray arraigned and condemned.

(14) The like iudgement, a few daies after, paſſed vpon the Lords, Cobham and Gray, arraigned on two ſeuerall daies. The former being indited, for cõbining with Sir Walter Raughley and George Brooke, to procure forces from the King of Spaine and the Arch-Duke, for an Inuaſion, &c. The other for ioyning with the foreſaid Prieſts, Knights, and Gentlemen, in their fore-mentioned conſpiracies. The Lord Chancellor of England, beeing Lord Steward for that ſeruice, ſate vnder a Cloth of Eſtate in the vpper end of the Hall, the Nobles ſitting (as their Peeres and Iudges) on benches vpon both ſides. Thoſe at the Barre he willed to bee bold, and to anſwere without feare: the Kings learned Counſell he intreated not to confound the memory of the priſoners with vnneceſſary matters: and the Peeres, though vnſworne, hee aduiſed to try indifferently betwixt the King and the arraigned; who both pleading not guilty, were yet found otherwiſe by the Court, and receiued iudgement of death.

Watſon and Clark vpon the 29. of Nouember.

(15) Of all theſe arraigned, Sir Edward Parham only was acquitted by the Iury, and of all the reſt onely three died, which were Watſon, Clarke, and Maſter George Brooke: the former of which, hauing at large laied open in Print, the Treaſons and vnſufferable machinations of the Ieſuiticall Order, left this ſuſpition on them at his death, that they, in reuenge, had cunningly and couertly drawen him into this Action, which brought him to this ſhamefull end. After whoſe death, his Maieſty then at Wilton, (hauing commanded his Lords, to deliuer the true narration vnto him of the whole proceeding in the arraignements and anſweres of all the reſt) ſigned alſo a warrant for the execution of the Lords Cobham and Gray, as alſo Markham, to be performed the Friday following before ten of the clock in the morning. Notwithſtanding his Maieſty more mooued to milde mercy, then the high ſtraine of Iuſtice, of his Princely and free clemencie, gaue life vnto thoſe perſons, expecting preſent death, and thus with his owne hand wrote to counterchecke his former Warrant.

The Kings mercifull reprmal of the Priſoners mody to dy.

(17) This Letter thus framed, the deliuery thereof his Maieſty committed vnto one Iohn Gibb a Scottiſh Gentleman, a diſcreet perſon, and free from dependancy of any Noble man or Counſellor, neither was he of any extraordinary ranke, as well that the by-ſtanders ſhould not obſerue any alteration for the execution, as the delinquents themſelues take any apprehenſion by his preſence, to the end that each of them ſeuerally ſhould prepare to breath out their laſt breath, with a true confeſſion of their ſecret conſciences. The time approching, Sir Griffin Markham brought to the Scaffold, (to that end erected on the Caſtle Greene) made himſelfe ready for the ſtroke of the Axe, when ſecretly Maſter Gibb deliuered vnto the high * Sheriffe of the Shire the Kings Warrant to the contrary, who ſoone perceiuing his Maieſties intent tooke backe the priſoner, (as if he were firſt to confront the two Lords in the Hall vpon ſome ſeruice to the King,) from the Scaffold, and brought him into the Caſtle Hall. Then was the Lord Gray brought forth, who hauing powred out his praiers vnto God, at length kneeling downe for the ſtroke of death, the Sheriffe bad ſtay, telling the Lord that ſome further ſeruice was expected of him, and thereupon likewiſe lead him againe into the Caſtle. The Lord Cobham then was brought to the Scaffold, who being in praiers and preparation for death, the Lord Gray and Sir Griffin were brought backe againe, where the priſoners all three appearing together on the Scaffold, the Sheriffe notified his Maieſties Warrant for the ſtay of their Executions, and that as then they ſhould not dy. Vpon which rare Clemency, vnexpected both of priſoners and ſpectators, aroſe ſuch ſhouts of the people, as was wonderfull, crying God ſaue the King, and the condemned ouercome with his Clemency, wiſhed they might ſacrifice their liues to redeeme their own faults and to repurchaſe ſo mercifull a Princes loue.

His Maiesties Oration vnto the Clergy.

(19) The first sitting was vpon Saturday, the foureteenth of Ianuary, in his Maisties Priuy-chamber at Hampton-Court, whereinto the Church-Gouernours onely being admitted (by his Maiesties commaund) in the presence of his Priuy Councell, he made a most godly and princely declaration of his entent, in summoning this Assembly, in effect, thus; That "this his proceeding was no nouell deuise, but ac- "cording to the example of all Christian Princes, "who in the commencement of their raignes, vsual- "ly take the first course for the establishing of the "Church both for doctrine and policy, to which "the very Heathen themselues had relation in this "their Prouerbe à Ioue Principium. And particu- "larly in this land, King Henry the eight, towards the "end of his raigne; after him King Edward the sixt, "who altered more; after him Queene Mary, who "reuersed all; and the last Queen of famous memo- "ry, who setled the Church state as now it stan- "deth. Wherein yet his Maiesty deemed himselfe "happier then they, in that they were faine to alter "those things which they found established, where- "as himselfe saw yet no cause, so much to change a- "ny thing, as to confirme that which He found so "well setled already. Which State so affected his "Royall heart, that it pleased him, both to enter in- "to a gratulation to almighty God, (at which words "he put off his hat) for bringing him into the land "of Promise, where Religion was purely professed, "where he sate among graue, learned, and reuerend "Diuines, who better knew what belonged to the "State of a King, to the honor and order of a king- "dom, then some other Nations did, and withall to "assure the Prelacy there present, that He inten- "ded not any Innouation, acknowledging the Go- "uernement Ecclesiasticall to haue beene approued "by manifold blessings from God himselfe, both for "the encrease of the Gospell, and with a most happy "and glorious peace. Yet, because nothing could "be so absolutely ordered, but that somewhat might "bee added, and in any State as in the body of man, "Corruptions like ill humors might insensibly grow "either through time or persons; his purpose was, "after the example of a good Phisitian, to make "search into the supposed diseases, and to examine "the complaints, so to remoue the occasions there- "of, if they proue scandalous, or to cure them, if "they were dangerous, or if but friuolous, yet to take "knowledge of them, thereby at once both to cast a "soppe into the mouth of Cerberus, and of all facti- "ous spirits, and withall to giue satisfaction to all "quiet and sober minded men.

Any alteration in the church since K. Henry 8.

No State without corruption.

His Maiesties demands touching some supposed abuses.

(20) His Maiesty concluding this his generall aduertisement, entred more particular discourse with the Bishops (for his owne priuate information) concerning the Booke of Common Prayer, Excommunication in the Ecclesiasticall Courts, and the prouision of fitte and able Ministers for Ireland. Touching matters in the saide Booke, hee desired satisfaction; First, for Confirmation, which if it were held and so called, as if the Sacrament of Baptisme were therby confirmed, & were inualidous without it, then was it in his iudgement blasphemous: but if it were only that Children, who at their Baptisme made profession of their faith by the mouthes of others, might before the Bishoppes professe it in their owne persons, and so receiue Episcopall Benediction by prayer, and impositon of hands, then was it of very sacred v.. in Gods Church. Secondly, for Absolution, which his Maiesty had heard compared to the Popes pardons. Thirdly, for Priuate Baptisme, which hee vtterly disliked to bee administred, but by a lawfull Minister. His second point was Excommunication, wherein hee moued two especiall considerations; the one of the Matter, that the sentence being so waighty, was not to bee pronounced vpon euery sleight cause: the other of the Person, why Lay-men as Chancellors & Commissaries, and not rather the Deane and Chapter, or other graue Ministers and Chaplaines should bee assumed by the Bishops for their assistants therein. The last, which was touching a sufficient Ministerie in Ireland, his Maiesty referred to another day.

(21) But his Maiesty receiued full satisfaction & contentment by the seuerall answeres to all his demands. Touching Confirmation, that the Church of England held it no essentiall part of the Sacrament of Baptisme, but a * practise of the Primitiue Church, yea of the * Apostles, (as * Caluin himselfe expounds their meaning, who also wished the restitution thereof in such Churches where it had beene abolished,) and for Imposition of hands on children, warranted by * Christ himselfe, a Custome still retained in our Church, as very godly and necessary for those very reasons and vses, which his Maiesty had mentioned, and truly obserued. Touching Absolution, it was answered, that as Christ desired not the death of sinners, so hee hath giuen power and commandement to his Ministers, to pronounce his mercy with remission of sinnes vnto all Penitents, that the practise hereof in the English Church, is so farre from Popery, as that the Reformed Churches of Augusta, Boheme, and Saxony, do both allow it, and retaine it, yea, and Caluin himselfe approues it. Of Priuate Baptisme it was answered, that though the words seemed somwhat doubtfull, yet the practise of the English Church did contradict all administration of it by Laickes and Women, in censuring them in that case: whereupon it was concluded, that a lawfull Minister only should be imployed in times of necessity, when the Infant was in danger of life; yet so vnderstood, that the person was in no wise to bee reputed of the Essence of the Sacrament. And finally, for Excommunication, it was there resolued, that the abuses (if any such there were) being remoued and amended, that sacred censure should retaine its necessary vigour in the Church; and so for that day his Maiesty dismissed the Assemby of his Prelates.

The Prelates satisfaction to his Maiesties demands.

(22) Vpon Munday following, being the sixteenth of Ianuary, those other Doctors, who were to relate the dislikes of the Opposites, were called likewise into the Priuy Chamber, where in presence of his Prelates and Peeres his Maiesty deliuered vnto them, a pithy & princely declaration of his mind, "That He intended not to innouate the gouerne- "ment now established, which by long experience "hee had found accomplished with so singular bles- "sings of God forty fiue yeeres, as that no Church "vpon the face of the earth hath more flourished "then this of England. But rather his meaning, and "earnest desire was, first to settle vniformity through "the whole, for the more quiet and flourishing e- "state thereof: secondly, to plant vnity for the sup- "pression of Papists, and enemies of Religion: third- "ly to amend, abuses as incident to Bodies politike, "as the shadow to the body Naturall; which once "getting entrance, hold on as a Wheele doth his "motion, when it is once set on going. Among the "complaints therefore of many greeuances made "since his entrance into England, none was more "weighty, nor himselfe more willing to heare and "amend, then such as might concerne the state of "the Church, if the same did in any wise decline "from the ancient and Apostolicall rule. For which "cause he had sent for them, whom hee vnderstood "to bee graue, learned, & modest Diuines, to heare "by them those greeuances, and seuerall obiections "at large, and desired them boldly to declare the "same.

so godly, so learned, so carefull a King, reduced all matters, either desired or disliked amongst the weake Brethren (whose Spokesman hee protested hee would not haue been, but onely vpon his Maiesties mandatory Summons) vnto those foure heades. 1. for preseruation of true doctrine. 2. for placing of good Pastors, 3. for sincere administration of the church gouernement; 4. for explanation of some clauses in the Common-prayer Booke. It would be here too impertinent, to farce an historicall Narration with those Theologicall particulars, which vpon those seuerall points were then produced, and are *elsewhere to be found exactly related. Yet as wee cannot but commend the iudgement of these foure Diuines (as touching the third point) in that, finding no iust exception to the Episcopall Hierarchie of our Church, in no one word they impugned or disapproued the same; so much more must we celebrate the admirable dexterity, iudgement and learning of his sacred Maiesty, ioyned with so rare industry and patience, whose owne accurate search and exquisite expositions of Scriptures, Fathers, and primitiue practises, did there both breed wonder & astonishment in that noble and learned audience, and also giue singular satisfaction (euen to the *agents for the Opposites) touching all the exceptions taken to the Church-state; which his Maiesty now found to bee no other then the phantasmes of a scrupulous indiscretion.

*The Conference at Hampton Court, printed 1604.

*They all promised obedience, and Doctor Sparke writ a booke to perswade vnto conformity.

(24) The Wednesday following, being the 18. of Ianuary (appointed for the next meeting) his Maiesty againe, with most of the Lords of his Priuy Councell, entred the Chamber; where the Reuerend Prelates with such others onely as the L. Archbishoppe appointed, (for so his Maiesty cōmanded) being admitted to his Royal presence, after some conference about the High Commission court, Subscription, Oath ex officio and the like, his Maiesty (causing the other foure Diuines to bee then called in) was pleased to declare what formerly had past; and for a conclusion, shut vp all with a godly ex-
"hortation, like another Constantine, perswading
"euery man to vnity, and to a diligent discharge of "their duties, their in seueral places; the superiors to
"gouerne without violence, the inferiors to obey
"without murmuring, and all of them to builde
"Gods Temple without sound of discord; desi-
"ring and commanding all present, not only them-
"selues to labour that way, but to be a meanes to "draw on all others vnto a peaceable conformity,
"the matters being no other (as now hee saw plaine-
"ly) but of meere weakenesse: wherein persons
"discreet would doubtlesse bee easily henceforward
"reclaimed, and for the vndiscreet & reluctant, their
"roomes were more behouefull then their seruices:
"by their fruites therefore He should discerne and "iudge them; Obedience and Humility being the "markes of honest and good men, which thence"forth hee would expect from as many as would "be held well affected to his Maiesty and his State.
Which princely exhortation (deliuered with much more feeling words, and mouing earnestnes) was so piercing as it fetched teares from some of both sides, and all vnanimously protested their most dutifull obedience to those his Royall commands.

The conclusion of the Conference.

(25) Besides this maine fruit of this famous conference, the setling of the Church-peace, sundry other important matters (not here to be pretermitted, because necessarily tending to that noble end) were therein also proiected, and by his Maiesties euer prouident care had then their conception, though after-times brought the birthes to perfection. The first (both in due ranke and vse) was his sacred Decree for a new Translation of the holy Scriptures, vpon a princely and pious care of Gods eternall Truth according to the Originals, as also for an vniforme reading thereof in the Churches. To which end three selected Companies from Oxford, Cambridge and in London, most iudicious in the languages and learning being imployed, after long conference, much reading, and diligent comparing of all translations with the ancient originals, it is now most exactly and happily published, as a witnesse to the world both of Gods constant promise, that Heauen and Earth should perish, but his word should neuer: and also of the Religious care of this his Vice-gerent, in seeking euen at the first, the first thing that man is commanded to seeke after, whose praise shall stand for euer in the Record of that godly worke, and the worke shall iustifie it selfe against all gaine-sayers to Gods eternall glory, and many soules great comfort.

The translation of the Bible intended and commanded.

(26) His second sacred proiect was, that as now in England, so also in Ireland, Wales, and the Northerne parts, true Religion (which He there auowed to bee the onely band of true obedience) might be throughly planted. Which religious purpose He so zealously prosecuted, especially for the North and all Scotland, as that He held it not sufficient to haue ioyned these two Kingdomes into one Temporall Monarchy, vnlesse He might see them both vnited also in the Doctrine, Regiment and Rites of one spirituall Hierarchy. Neither was his princely wisdome for the meanes lesse conspicuous then his zeale in the intendment, in making so heedfull choise of such English Diuines, as were (not long after) in this imployment sent into Scotland; the very first, in which Apostolike Ambassage for establishing those Neighbour-Churches was he, whose eminency both for Place and Piety, is now worthily foremost in guiding our owne; and whose blessed trauels in that seruice, as they were acceptable to God, his Maiesty, and that Nation; so are they a document to others, how powerful & admirably successeful true Learning is, where it is guided with true Prudence, and where Piety and loue of Gods glory is linked with Charity, and zeale of mans good.

The King second religious proiect at the Conference.

The now Lord Archbishoppe of Canterbury (D. George Abbot) the first preacher sent into Scotland.

(27) This great businesse and conference so rolally accomplished, his Maiesties next care was (herein also as another Constantine) to perpetuate the maintenance of this flourishing Church (whose peaceable estate hee had thus prouided for) with the reuenues of her ancient foundations; as also to establish salutary lawes for the peaceable gouernment of his people; to which purpose a Parliament was assembled at Westminster, the 19. of March, wherein, for the Church it was enacted, that neither Archbishoppe nor Bishoppe should alienate, assure, giue, grant, demise, or in any sort conuay, no, not to the King himselfe, his Heires or Successors, any of the Honors, Castles, Manors, Lands, Tenements or Hereditaments, being parcell of the possessions of his Archbishoppricke or Bishoppricke; and if any so were, to bee vtterly voide and of none effect, notwithstanding any former law, statute, act, or ordinance to the contrary.

A Parliament held March 19. The Church lands not to be alienated.

Ex Parliament. Iacobi primi.

(28) Foure dayes before this Parliament commenced, it pleased his Maiesty, with the most noble Queene Anne, and the most illustrious Prince Henry, attended with glorious troupes of great Peeres, Prelates, and Courtiers, to ride in triumph through the City of London to Westminster, the houses beautified with rich hangings, the streets adorned with goodly Trophees and Pageantes, of seuerall nations inhabiting, the rayles on both sides couered with blew cloth, the seuerall Companies honourably addressed, and ranked vnder the displayed Ensignes and Armes of their seuerall Trades and Sciences; the one shewing the wealth and state of the City; the other, the body of the Citizens and gouernement, and all making manifest the vnspeakeable ioy they conceiued to receiue their great Soueraigne into this His City and Imperiall Chamber. In pledge of which their excessiue ioy, vnfained loue, and vowed fidelity, the Recorder at the Crosse in Cheape, both gratulated his Maiesty with a * pithy speech in the name of the City, and wishing him a golden raigne, presented his Greatnesse with a cuppe cuppe of gold; deliuering another likewise to the Queene, and a third to the Prince, which were all no lesse graciously accepted, then most louingly presented.

(29) Neither lesse was his Maiesties desire to retaliate the Citizens and other his Subiects true affections, when recounting the great hinderances of Marchandizing and Nauigations of trafficke, by reason of the long continued breach betwixt England and Spaine, his royall heart tendring his Subiects tranquilitie, endeauoured to salue againe those wounds of discord with the *sweet balme of Peace; which was solemnly proclaimed in London, August 19. the sea being made open to Merchants for their free commerce.

*Psal. 141. v. 6

(30) Both Domesticke and forraine affaires thus plausibly composed, as his Maiesty was the first, who in this last age of the world held the Scepter of the whole Iland in his royall hand, so to vnite the two stiles vnder the name of one entire Empire, and the two Nations into a ioint blessed vnity; Hee caused himselfe by Proclamation to be enstiled King of Great Britaine, according to the ancient name of this Isle before the Saxons Conquest; the restoring of which name againe, many foredooming spirits had anciently presaged, as now wee see effected. Vnto which Imperiall stile, are rightly annexed the kingdomes of France and Ireland, rightfully belonging by birth and Conquest vnto the Crowne of England.

The two kingdomes vnited vnder the name of Great Britaine.

(31) Two other Proclamations afterwards came forth; the one for the Banishment of all Iesuites & Seminary Priests, out of the land, and the other to confirme the Ecclesiasticall gouernment, and Booke of Common Prayer, in the same forme and estate, as Queene Elizabeth left them; to the no little griefe of the workers for Rome, whose designes began now to sucke in such poyson, as in the venting whereof, not onely the earth might haue trembled vnder the weight of such monsters, but euen the heauens be astonied and confounded, to giue those Serpents the breath or benefit of aire. Vnto which bloudy, horrible and odious act to God and man my Stile must now turne: a matter indeed so distastiue for mee to remember, or to write of, that it abhorres my very soule to fill the penne with inke, or to blotte the paper with these far blacker spots of darknes, and deformers of Englands faire face.

Iam. 2, 12. The treason conceiued against the State.

(32) The plotte was to vndermine the Parliament house, and with Gunpowder to blow vp the King, the Prince, Clergy, Nobles, Knights and Burgesses, the very confluence of all the flower of Glory, Piety, Learning, Prudence, Authority in the land; fathers, sonnes, brothers, allyes, friends, foes, Papists, and Protestants, all at one blast. A stratageme inuented by him that blowes the bellowes of destruction, fashioned in the forge of the bottomlesse pitte, put in practise in a vault of darknesse, and forwarded by him that is the father of darkenesse, and in darkenesse I could wish it might euer dwell, whose like was neuer reuealed to the light of the Sunne. Their intent, when that religious atchieuement had beene performed, was to surprize the remainder of the Kings Issue, to alter religion and the State, and to bring in forraine power. Sir Edmund Baynam an attainted person (who stiled himselfe Prince of the damned Crew) was sent vnto the Pope, as hee was a temporall Prince, to acquaint him with the Gunpowder-treason; a fitte Poste indeed to bee imployed betwixt the Pope and the Diuell.

(33) This treason was first set on foot in the last yeere of the late Queenes raigne, when Henry Garnet the Superiour of the Iesuites, Catesby and others sent Thomas Winter into Spaine to negociate with King Philip in the name of the English Catholikes; first, to send an army vnto them, who now were in a readinesse to ioyne their Forces with his; secondly, to grant some pensions vnto sundry persons deuoted to his seruice in England: and thirdly, to giue aduertisement of the discontents that the young Gentlemen and Souldiers had conceiued vpon the death of Essex, whereby a most fit occasion was then offered to forward the common cause. To prosecute which businesse, he made for his means father Creswell the Leiger Iesuite in Spaine, Don Petro Franceso second Secretary to the State, and the Duke of Lerma, a great Counsellor to the king; all of them being said to haue assured this ill commissioned Ambassador, that the office of his imployment would bee very gratefull to their master.

Winter sent into Spaine.

(34) The place for landing concluded vpon by these wise Statists, was Kent or Essex, if the Kings Army were great; if otherwise, then Milford Haven in Wales was held fittest: with these and other like complots, Winter all that summer followed the King in his Progresse, and lastlie had answere by the Count Miranda, that his King would bestow a hundred thousand Crownes towards the expedition, halfe thereof to bee paide that present yeere, and the rest in the next Spring, when (at the farthest) hee meant to set foot in England; on whose behalfe hee willed the English Catholikes to maintain their promise, whom hee respected (as was auowed) as his owne proper Castilians: And further desired their continuall aduertisements, if in the mean time it chanced the old Queene to die.

The plots determined for the inuasion of England.

King Philips answere and offer.

(35) Winter thus laden with hopes, returneth from Spaine, and emptieth his male into the bosoms of Garnet, Catesby, and Tresham, and they vnto others, all of them tickled to heare the newes, rested fully satisfied, expecting the day. But before the Spring-time was fully approched, that Morning Starre, and Mirror of her Sexe, did set in our West, the thrice glorious Elizabeth, who had now iudged Israel full forty foure yeeres in admirable tranquility, as in her raigne wee haue sufficiently seene. To signifie whose death Christopher Wright was from Catesby and others sent into Spaine, and Guy Fawkes likewise was posted thither from Bruxels by Sir William Stanley, both of them to prosecute the former negotiation, assuring the Spanish King, that King Iames meant to runne the same course, and to proceede as rigorously against the Catholikes, as the late Queene had done: for whose defence they instantly desired that some Spaniards might bee transported vnto Milford-Hauen, where the Romish-minded would bee forward to assist them, hauing in a readinesse two thousand horse furnished for the enterprise. But King Philip aswell poizing his honour, as his zeale for Religion, and obseruing a great difference betwixt States in hostility, and of Kings raigning in friendshippe, in no wise would listen to inuade England, or further to proceed in any forcible enterprise.

The hopes of the English Catholikes.

Christopher Wright sent into Spaine to signifie the death of the Queene.

(36) In the meane while the Iesuites had been tampering to disswade the acceptance of King Iames into England, vrging it for a Maxime, that death was to bee indured, rather then to admit an heretike (so it pleased them to tearme the Lords annointed) and those that gaue him consent they held lyable to Excommunication by the censure of Pope Clement the eight, who had liberally bestowed vpon his sacred person the names of a Puritan, an Heretike, a Caluinist, a Persecutor of Protestants, and another Iulian Apostata.

King Philip refuseth all hostile attempts against England.

(37) The Romanists thus loosened from their Ankor-hold of Spaine, and left by that Pilote to shift for themselues, now perceiued their owne error in their long expectation, That change of State would change Religion: but shee now gone, whose life they had often laid for, and her godly Successor no whit inferior to her for aduancing the Gospell: their hopes grew desperate (as these desperates alleadged) and no other meanes now left them but onely to kill the King, whom they falsly calumniated to haue broken his promise for a toleration in Religi-

King Iames scandalized by the Papists.

Religion, as Watſon and Percy had diuulged among them; yea, and a fraudulent meſſage was ſent to the Pope by the Scotiſh Secretary, that K. Iames would become his obedient ſonne. But how farre his religious heart was from theſe aſperſions, appeared both by Watſon himſelfe, who, condemned to die, tooke it vpon the ſaluation of his ſoule, that hee could not draw the ſmalleſt comfort from the King for a toleration of the Catholikes, but that himſelfe had imparted his wordes in a milder tune then his Maieſty meant them, onely to keepe (as he excuſed the matter) the Catholikes in loue and duty vnto the King: and ſince by the Lord of Balmerinoth (Secretary to the King in Scotland) who acknowledging his offence, hath beene arraigned and found guiltie of death, for deuiſing letters, and ſending them to Rome, which himſelfe cunningly got ſigned in ſhufling them amongſt others, his Maieſty being vtterly ignorant of the Contents.

(38) Vpon which falſe ſuggeſtions, the Atheiſtical poſition of Catesby was grounded, who holde it for an Axiome as father Parſons had taught: That the whole Schoole both of Diuines and Lawyers make it a poſition certain, and to bee vndoubtedly beleeued, That if any Chriſtian prince whatſoeuer, ſhall manifeſtly turne from the Catholike Religion, and deſire or ſeeke to reclaime other men from the ſame, he preſently falleth from all princely power and dignity, and that alſo by vertue and power of the Law it ſelfe both diuine and humane, euen before any ſentence pronounced againſt him by the ſupreme Paſtor and Iudge. And that his Subiects of what eſtate or condition ſoeuer are freed from all bond of oath of Alleagiance which at any time they had made vnto him as to their lawfull Prince. Nay, that they both may and ought (prouided they haue competent ſtrength and force) caſt out ſuch a man from bearing rule among Chriſtians, as an Apoſtata, an Heretike, a Backe-ſlider, and Reuolter from our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and an enemy to his owne State and Common-wealth, leſt perhaps hee might infect others, or by his example or command turne them from the faith. Yea; one ſteppe further elſewhere is ſtood vpon, that if any Prince ſhall but fauour or ſhew countenance to an Heretike, hee preſently looſeth his Kingdome. And thus they conclude, that for Hereſie a Prince is to bee depoſed, and his kingdome to bee beſtowed at the pleaſure of the Pope, for whom the People vpon paine of damnation are to take part and fight: out of which deteſtable concluſions aroſe the firſt ſmoake of the Gunpowder Treaſon.

(40) Winter thus poſted to negotiate with the Conſtable, found him at Bergen neere Dunkirke, and by the meanes of Owen the fugitiue Traitor, deliuered his meſſage; whoſe anſwere was, that he had a ſtrict command from his Maſter to doe all good offices for the Catholikes, and for his owne part hee found himſelfe bound in conſcience not to omit any good occaſion that might forward their cauſe: although indeed hee did but temporize as Sir William Stanley told Winter, for the great deſire which the Spaniards had that the Peace might proceed with England. Whereupon Winter (hopeleſſe that way) returned for England, bringing with him the foreſaid Fawkes, a fitte inſtrument for ſo diueliſh a deſigne; and comming to Lambeth, told Catesby that the Conſtable was not the man whatſoeuer were his words, and that all now in theſe parts were bent for a concluſion of Peace; which ſounded ſo harſhly in his ill-tuned eares, that his braines became more buſied about his impious Proiect, and his mind in continuall trauell to bring forth that ſinne, which hee had moſt vnnaturally conceiued.

(41) Robert Catesby, Iohn Wright, Thomas Winter, and Guy Fawkes holding a community in their miſchiefes ſtill about London; about the middeſt of Eaſter-Terme, Thomas Percy as hote as the Hotſpur himſelfe to forward Rebellion, came puffing to Catesbies lodging in Lambeth, and the firſt word hee ſpake was this: What Gentlemen ſhall wee alwaies be talking, and neuer doe any thing? you perceiue (I know) how things doe proceed. To whom Catesby anſwered, that ſomething was reſolued vpon, but firſt an Oath for ſecreſie was to bee miniſtred. For which purpoſe they appointed to meet ſome three daies after behind S. Clements Church without Temble-barre, where being met, and falling in Conference, Catesby alleaged that this laſt Parliament had left the Catholikes in as much danger as they ſtood before, & that now the peace with Spaine was rather a meane for harder lawes to proceed, then thoſe in force againſt them to bee abrogated; ſo that the ancient Romiſh Religion, & the Catholike profeſſors thereof muſt now bee enforced to bid England adue, if Gentlemen of power and repute ſhould thus giue way to the contrary proceedings, or thus make nice how to helpe, or where to beginne: at which ſpeech Percy made preſent anſwere, himſelfe was the man that wold vndergoe the Catholike cauſe, were it with the ſlaughter of the King, which hee was there ready to vndertake and doe.

(42) No Tom (ſaid Catesby) thou ſhalt not aduenture thy ſelfe to ſo ſmall purpoſe, if thou wilt bee a Traitor, there is a plot to greater aduantage, and ſuch a one as can neuer bee diſcouered: and thereupon all of them taking the Oath of ſecreſie, hearing the Maſſe and receiuing the Sacrament, Catesby told them his diueliſh deuiſe, which was by Mine and Gunpowder to blow vp the Parliament houſe, and at one ſtroke with the deſtruction of many, effect that at once, which had beene many yeeres in attempting. A matter eaſily performed (as he vrged) if men of reſolution would thereunto beſtow their purſe and their paines; and moſt ſure from ſuſpition of diſcouery, the deſigne being ſo eſtranged from the conceit of man: wherein he alſo obſerued that religious Iuſtice was thirſty of reuenge, euen vpon the ſame perſons, and in the ſame place, whence ſhee firſt receiued the vniuſt lawes enacted againſt her. For caſe of conſcience to kill the Innocent with the nocent, hee told them it was warrantable by the authority of Garnet himſelfe, the Superior of the Engliſh Ieſuites, and of Gerrard, and Teſmond (Ieſuiticall Prieſts likewiſe) who by their Apoſtolical power did abſolue and commend the fact, which for the aduantage of the Catholikes was to bee executed (they ſaid) though with the death of ſome Innocents, rather then the ſeruice ſhould quaile, the neceſſity of time and occaſion ſo requiring it. The Oath was giuen them by the ſaid Gerrard (the Diuels Atturney in this buſineſſe) the forme whereof was as followeth.

(43) The proiect thus farre paſſed, the practiſe was to proceed; and the firſt thing ſought after was for for a house wherein they might beginne their work, to which purpose, no place was held fitter then a certaine edifice adioyning to the wall of the Parliament house, which serued for withdrawing roomes for the assembled Lords; and out of Parliament was at the dispose of the Keeper of the place and Wardrobe thereunto belonging. These did Percie hire for his lodgings, entertaining Fawkes (as most vnknowne by face) for his man, who changing his name into Iohnson, had the Keyes and keeping of the rooms. Neither was this enough, but a house must be also had to supply Percies lodgings for prouision of Powder, & to frame and fit wood for the carriage of the Mine, which Catesby prouided at Lambeth, & sware his man Keyes into their Conspiracies, making him the Keeper of those his prouisions, who in the night as occasion serued, conuaied the same vnto the custody of Fawkes.

Fawkes changed his name into Iohnson.

(44) The appointed day for the Parliament being the 7 of February, in October before it was thought fitte to beginne the worke, whereupon Fawkes returning forth of the Country, found Percies rooms appointed for the Scotish Lords to meet in, there to conferre touching the Vnion of the two Kingdoms: so that they feared (for that present) to iniate their attempt. But that honourable assembly dissolued, vpon the eleuenth of December late in the night, they entred into their Worke of Darkenes, and begun their Mine; hauing tooles prepared, and baked meates prouided, the better to auoid suspition by sending abroad.

Tomas Percy.
Thomas Winter.
Iob. Wright.
Guy Fawkes.

(45) The Moles that first vnderwent these vnder-minings, were Robert Catesby Esquier, the mouing Arch-traitor, and ruine of his name, Thomas Percy Esquier, kinsman and attendant vpon the Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Winter, Iohn Wright and Guy Fawkes Gentlemen, all of them grounded schollers of the Romish Schoole, and such earnest labourers in this their Vault of Villany, that by Christmas Eue (which very day might haue remembred them of more Christian workes) they had brought the worke vnder an entry, vnto the wall of the Parliament-house, vnderpropping still as they went the earth with their framed Timber, nor till that day were they seene abroad of any man.

The Traitors conference how to proceed after their treasons.

(46) During this vndermining, much consultation was had how to fashion the rest of the busines, after the deed should bee accomplished, and many questions propounded and argued at full, before they could pitch on a setled resolution. The first was how to surprize the next heire to the Crowne; for though they doubted not, but Prince Henry would accompany his Father, & take his lot with him, yet they feared lest D. Charles (being absent, as too yong to attend at Parliament) would escape their train, and perchance be so carefully guarded, and attended vpon at Court, that hee would hardly bee gotten into their hands. Of which first rub in their way, Percie offered himselfe to bee the first remouer, and shewed his meanes, which was, that with some other Gentlemen, hee would enter the Dukes Chamber, which by reason of his acquaintance hee very well might doe without any suspition: and others of his like acquaintance should bee placed at seueral dores in the Court: so that when the blow was giuen, and all men in a maze, then would hee carry away the Duke, which hee presumed would be easily done, the most of the Court being then absent, and the present altogether vnprouided for to make resistance.

Duke Charles intended to be surprised.

(47) For the surprize of the Lady Elizabeth, it was held a matter of farre lesse difficulty, she remaining at the Lord Haringtons, and Ashby (Catesbies house) neer vnto her, whether vnder a shew of Hunting, diuers Catholikes should bee gathered, who hauing the aduantage in knowing for what purpose they were assembled, had the full liberty of that distracted time, to prouide money, horses, armour and other abiliments of war, vnder pretense of strength to guard and secure the heire apparant.

The Lady Elizab. laith intended to be taken from the L. Harrington

(48) Then it was discussed, what Lords they should saue from the Parliament; where it was agreed, that they should keepe thence as many as they could that were Catholikes, or that way fauouring: all others to feele the smart, and the imputation of the Treason to be cast vpon the Puritanes, to make them more odious to the world.

(49) Next it was controuersed what forraine princes shold be made priuy to these their purposes; for to enioyne them to secresie, or to oblige them by oath, was not in their power: & to assay their likes or dislikes, would proue dangerous. For if any of them approued the design, their preparation might beget suspition: if not then the feares of discouery would extinguish the enterprise, no man daring to proceed further therein. Spaine was held the fittest to second their attempts, but hee was too slow in his preparations, & France too neere and too dangerous to be dealt with, and how Holland stood affected to England they all very well knew. But in the midst of these turmoiles and minings vnder-ground, the Parliament was againe adiourned till the fift of October ensuing. Vpon which Proclamatiō they brake off both discourse and worke till the feast of Saint Maries Purification. At which time they laide in powder and other prouisions, and then beganne againe to worke, hauing taken into their company Christopher Wright and Robert Winter, both of them sworne, and receiuing the Sacrament for secresie. The wall (which was very hard, & nine foot thicke) with great labour they wrought halfe through, Fawkes being their Centinell to giue warning when any came neere, that the noise in digging might not bee heard.

The feares concerned to open the treasons to forraine Princes.

The Parliament againe prorogued.

Robert Winter, Christopher Wright taken into consort.

The worke again begun.

(50) The labourers thus working into the wal, were suddenly surprised with a great feare, and casting from them their digging tooles, tooke to their weapons, hauing sufficient of shot and powder in the house, being fully resolued, rather to die in the place, then to yeeld or be taken. The cause of their feare was a noyse they heard in a roome vnder the Parliament house, vnder which they meant to haue mined, directly vnder the Chaire of Estate. But al now at a stand, & their countenance cast each vpon other, as doubtfull what would bee the issue of this their enterprise: Fawkes scowted forth to discry (if hee could) what was done abroad, and finding all safe and free from suspect, returned and told them, the noyse was onely a remouall of coales there now vpon sale, and that the Cellar was to bee let, which would bee more commodious to their purpose, and would also spare the labour in the Mine. Whereupon Thomas Percy vnder pretence for stowage of his winter prouision of wood and coales, went and hired the Cellar, which done, a new conference was had.

The feare of the Traitors.

(51) Wherein Catesby found the weight of the whole too heauy for himselfe alone to support; for besides the maintenance of so many persons, and the seuerall houses for seuerall vses, hired and payde for by him, the Gunpowder and other prouisions would rise to a very great summe, and indeede too much for one mans purse. Therefore he desired that himselfe, Percy, and some one more might call in such others as they thought fit to helpe to maintain the charge, alleadging that they knew men of worth and wealth, that would willingly assist, but were not willing their names should bee known to the rest. This his request they approued as necessary, and withall surceasing further to digge in the Vault, knowing the Cellar would be of better vse for their designes, they remoued twenty Barrels of Gunpowder into that roome, which they couered with a thousand of Billets, and fiue hundred of faggots, so that now the lodging roomes were cleared of all suspitious prouisions, and freely might bee entred without danger of descry.

(52) But the Parliament being againe prorogued vntil the fift of Nouember following, these foresaid vnderminers of our State and happinesse thought fitte they should againe (for a while) disperse themselues (matters being already in so good forwardnes) and that Guy Fawkes should go ouer to acquaint Sir William Stanley, & M. Hugh Owen with these their proceedings, yet so as the oath of secresie should be taken of them. For their policy was to haue Sir William Stanleys presence so soone as the dismal blow should bee giuen, to bee a leader to their intended stratagems, whereof (as they thought) they should haue great need, & that Owen should remain where hee was, to hold correspondency with forrain Princes, to allay (asmuch as hee might) the odiousnes of the fact, or to impute the Treason to the Puritanes discontents.

(53) Fawkes comming into Flanders found Owen, vnto whom, after the oath, hee declared the plotte, which hee very well approued. But Sir William Stanley (at that time in Spaine) Owen said would be hardly drawne into the businesse, for that hee had suites in the English Court himselfe, yet hee promised to forward him in all that hee could, and to send him into England with the first, when their proiect had taken effect. Whereupon Fawkes to auoid further suspition, kept stil in Flanders vntill the beginning of September, and then returning, receiued the keyes of the Cellar, and laid in more powder, billets and fagots; which done, hee retired into the Country, and there kept till the end of October.

(54) In the meane while Catesby and Percy meeting at the Bathe, it was there concluded, because their number were but few, that Catesby himselfe should haue power to call in whome hee would to aide their designe: by which authority he tooke in Sir Euerard Digby of Rutlandshire knight, and Francis Tresham of Northamptonshire Esquier, both of them of sufficient estate and wealth, had they not abused both to their owne destruction: for Sir Euerard offered fifteene hundred pounds to forward the action, and Tresham two thousand. But Percy disdaining that any should outrun him in euill, promised foure thousand pounds out of the Earle of Northumberlands rents, and tenne horses of speed to steed them when the blow was past. Against which time to prouide munition, Catesby likewise tooke in Ambrose Rookewood and Iohn Grant two Recusant Gentlemen, and vndoubtedly others were written in the same Roll, had these two grand Electors beene apprehended aliue, whose owne tongues only could vnfold their Catalogues Record.

(55) The businesse thus forwarded by their complices abroad, their Inmates did not neglect the supplies at home. For Percy, Winter and Fawkes had stored the Cellar with thirty sixe Barrels of Gunpowder, and vpon them bestowed (in steed of shot) Barres of Iron, logges of timber, massie stones, Iron Crowes, Picke-axes, and all their working tooles, and (to couer all) great store of Billets and fagots, so that nothing was wanting but fall in a readinesse, attending that great and terrible day. Neither were the Iesuiticall Priests slacke on their parts, who vsually concluded their Masses and oblatory Sacrifices, with their prayers for the good successe of their expected hopes, as by these verses, made and vsed by Garnet is to be seene.

Gentem auserte perfidam credentium de finibus,
Vt Christo laudes debitas persoluamus alacriter.

And others thus, Prosper Lord their paines that labour in thy cause day and night, let Heresie vanish away like smoake, let their memory perish with a cracke, like the ruine and fall of a broken house: Allusions doubtlesse to the labours in the Vault, the mounting smoake of powder, and the fall of the Parliament house, which if it had hapned, they might haue said to haue bin Prophetically foretold by their high Priests for that yeere.

(56) But the Lord that neuer slipt the deliuerance of his elect, kept this his Israel as the Apple of his own eye, & this pit digged for the destruction of others, they fell into themselues: so that we may wel say, If the Lord had not bin on our sides when mẽ rose vp against vs, they had swallowed vs vp quicke, when their wrath was kindled against vs; but praised bee the Lord which hath not giuen vs a pray vnto their teeth: our soule is escaped euen as a bird out of the snare of the fowler, the snare is broken, and wee are deliuered. For this Cockatrice egge hatched by themselues proued a Serpent onely to themselues, and themselues (by Gods hand) made the only Instruments to breake the shell of their owne treason. Psal. 124.

(57) For vpon Thursday in the euening, tenne dayes before the intended Parliament, a letter directed to the Lord Mounteagle was deliuered by an vnknowne person vnto his footman in the streete, with a straight charge giuen, to giue it into his Lords owne hand, which accordingly hee did. The letter was without date and subscription, and somewhat vnlegible, so as the Nobleman called for one of his seruants to assist him therein, the strange contents whereof much perplexed the true construction, as whether writ by some Pasquill to scarre him from attendance, or as matter of consequence from aduise of some friend. Howsoeuer, though it were supper time, and the night as darke as the purport of the letter; yet to discharge his loyall duty, hee forthwith repaired to the Kings Palace at Whitehal, where he imparted the letter to the Earle of Salisbury, Principall Secretary, and they both presently acquainted the L. Chamberlaine therewith, who deemed the matter not a little to concern himself, the charge of his office being to ouersee all places whether his Maiesty was to repaire, these two Counsellors shewed the same letter to the Earles of Worcester and Northampton, who together concluded (how sleight soeuer the contents seemed to appeare, as proceeding from some surmises of an idle and light braine) to acquaint the King himselfe with the same, which accordingly was done, and was as followeth.

The letter sent to the Lord Monteagle.

My Lord, out of the loue I beare to some of your friends, I haue a care of your preseruation. Therefore I would aduise you, as you tender your life, to deuise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this Parliament. For God and man haue concurred to punish the wickednesse of this time. And thinke not sleightly of this aduertisement, but retire your selfe into your Country, where you may expect the euent in safety. For though there bee no appearance of any stirre, yet I say, they shall receiue a terrible blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsell is not to be contemned, because it may doe you good, and can doe you no harme, for the danger is past so soone as you haue burnt the letter. And I hope God will giue you the grace to make good vse of it: to whose holy protection I commend you.

(58) His Maiesty a while pausing, & then re-reading the letter, deliuered his iudgement, that the stile thereof was too quicke and pythy to bee a libell bred from the superfluities of an idle braine, and on the instant did apprehend by these words; that they should receiue a terrible blow at this Parliament, & yet should not see who hurt them, that a sodaine danger by blast of Gunpowder should be intended by some base villaine in a corner, no insurrection, rebellion, or desperate attempt appearing. And thereforẽ wished, that the vnder rooms of the Parliament house might bee throughly searched, before himselfe, or Peeres should sit therein. To which purpose it was then concluded, that the L. Chamberlaine should (according to his office and place) view all the rooms aboue ãnd below: but aswell to stay idle rumors, as to let things ripen to reueale their own mysteries, this his search should bee deferred vntill Munday, the day immediately before the Parliament, & then to bee with a seeming slight eye, to auoid suspect.

(59) The Earle of Suffolke, Lord Chamberlaine, according to the conclusion, vpon Munday in the after- November. 4 afternoone (being accompanied with the L. Monteagle, who still thirsted to see the issue) repaired vnto those vnder-roomes, and finding the Sellar so sufficiently stored with wood and coales, demanded of Fawkes (the counterfeit Iohnson, who stood there attending as a seruant of small repute) who owed the place; his answere was, that the lodgings belonged to M. Thomas Percy, and the Sellar likewise, to lay in his winter prouision, himselfe being the Keeper and M. Percies seruant. Whereunto the Earle as void of any other suspition, presently replied, that his Master was well prouided against Winters blasts: but being come forth, the Lord Monteagle told him, that hee did much suspect Percy to bee the inditer of the letter, knowing his affection in religion, and the friendship betwixt them professed, so as his heart gaue him (hee said) when hee heard Percy named, that his hand was in the act.

(60) The Lord Chamberlaine returning, related to the King in presence of some Counsellors, what hee had seene: and the suspition that the Lord Monteagle had of Percy, and himselfe of Iohnson his man; which presently encreased his Maiesties apprehension and iealousie, whereupon hee insisted, that a narrow search should be made, and those billets and coales should be turned to the bottome, which as he confidently supposed was the couering of some notable intended treason. But some moued the doubt how this search should be made: for albeit no caution could be too much in so great a danger, yet the inducement thereunto, being no more then a nameless inscript, shufled no man knew whence, and might wel be the euaporation of an idle brain, wold seeme (if nothing were found) some scandall vnto the State, to bee ouer suspitious of so friuolous a toy, and withall might leaue some sad imputation on a great counsellor of the land. Notwithstanding, his Maiesty still persisting in his former opinion, willed that the search should be throughly made, and no possibility of danger left vnexamined, vnlesse they meant to goe to the Parliament, and leaue the hazard to the euent, which hee thought they in conscience were loth to doe. Whereupon it was concluded, that the search should be made; but vnder color of searching for certaine hangings belonging to the house which were missing, and conuaied away.

(61) Sir Thomas Kneuet, (now Lord Kneuet, then a Gentleman of his Maiesties Priuy-Chamber) was imployed herein, and about midnight (before the very morning when the Parliament was to beginne) went vnto the place with a small but well affected company. At the dore of entrance into the Cellar, finding one (which was Guy Fawkes) at so vnseasonable a time, cloaked and booted, hee thought fitte to apprehend him, and entring the place, ouerturned the billets and coales, when presently hee found the Serpents nest, stored with thirty sixe barrels (small and great) of gunpowder, then searching the villaine that should haue hatched these egges, found about him a darke lanterne, three matches and other instruments for blowing vp the powder: who no whit daunted, instantly confessed his guiltines, and was so farre from contrition or repentance, as hee vowed, that had hee been found within the house (as indeed hee was then but immediately come foorth from his worke) hee certainely would haue blowne vp the house with himselfe, and them all: & was so obdurate in his Romish resolution, that being brought before the Lords of the Councell, hee lamented nothing so much, as that the deed had not been done, saying, that the Diuell and not God was the discouerer of the plot.

(62) As desperate were Catesby, Percy, and the rest, who hauing notice that the L. Montegles letter did giue some ouerture of suspition, yet would they stay to see the successe, and forsooke not London vntill the same day wherein the deed should haue beene done: Catesby, Percy, Rookewood, both the Wrights, and Thomas Winter, posted all into Warwickshire, where Grant and his associates had taken certaine great horses out of a stable, to forward their hoped great day. These meeting at Dunchurch, where Sir Everard Digby had made a match for a set hunting, not with hounds for the hare (which was only the colour) but with Nimrod for bloud, and surprize of the most vertuous young Princesse Lady Elizabeth, were told (by the escaped) of their certaine discouery, and presently scarred with report of pursuit; when strucke with terror, not knowing where to make stay, or whither to stir, they desperately beganne an open rebellion, pretending the cause was Religion, and affirming for truth, that all the Catholikes throates were appointed to be cut. And so trouping together, wandred through Warwickshire, the edges of Worcester, and borders of Stafford shire, their seruants and aiders being about fourescore men, & those euer ready to steale away from them, more care was in keeping, then trust reposed either in their faith or defence. Yet thus ranging, and finding no resistance, they rifled the Lord Windsors house of all the Armour, shot, powder, and other warlike prouisions, but the weather rainy, and the waters somewhat high, the powder in carriage took wet, and thereby became more vnseruiceable, God in his iustice so ordering the successes, that the element of water, and accident of fire fought against them, as the stars in their courses did against Sisera. Iudg. 5. 20.

(63) For their last fort of refuge, being Holbach in Staffordshire (the house of Stephen Littleton) whither Sir Richard Walsh (high Shiriffe of Worcestershire) pursued them, who thinking the stirre no greater (though so great enough) then some fray or riot, sent his Trumpet vnto them, commanding to render themselues vnto him his Maiesties Minister, with promise of his best meanes (if they so did) to allay the offence. But their owne consciences witnessing what the Shiriffe knew not, told them the fault was too waighty to leaue them any hope of fauour: and thereupon returned answere, that hee had needé of greater assistance then of those few numbers that were with him, before hee could be able to command or controll them. So preparing for resistance, they made ready their weapons, and hauing laid two pound of the said powder in a platter to drie in the chimney, one (a Millar) comming to amend the fire, threw in a billet, wherewith a sparke flying out, chanced to fall on the powder, whose sodaine blast was so violent, that (though being of so small a quantity) it blew vp the roofe of the house, and scortched the bodies and faces of Catesby, Rookewood and Grant, with some others, whose consciences then strucken with the guilt of their sinne, made them see Gods searching iustice in punishing like with like. Thus being dieected with the accident, and now knowing that all was lost, like desperate men, they there resolued to die together, set open the gate, suffered the Shiriffes followers to rush in among them, and by valour (as they tearmed it) fought for their owne destruction; for both the Wrights were therein shot downe dead, Ambrose Rookwood, & Thomas Winter were very sore wounded; and lastly, Catesby and Percy resolutely fighting, backe to backe, were both of them slaine with one bullet of musket-shot.

Fire-working Traitors punished by fire.

(64) Thus these high aspiring spirites, deceiued with the spirit of illusion, vnder opinion of religion, and dreaming of no lesse then destruction of King, Princes and people, with alterations of kingdomes, Church and State, were miserably defeated, not by humane prouidence, but diuine mercy. Some presently flame in heate of Rebellion, others deadly wounded were taken aliue, the rest either whole or but lightly hurt, were led prisoners to London, and to other places, all the way gazed at, reuiled and detested by the common people, as some strange Monsters of the world, for this their hellish and horrible Treason; and lastly condemned & executed as they most worthily deserued; whose inditemẽts, arraignments and confessions, I refer to be read in the true

(65) In memory of which great deliuerance, the fifth of November (the day appointed for mercileſſe deſtruction) was by authority of the ſame Parliament enacted to be for euer celebrated with thankſgiuing, prayſe and prayers vnto our heauenly Preſeruer, and to bee kept holy vnto the Lord through our generations, which we wiſh may bee obſerued, with no leſſe acknowledgement of Gods infinite mercies to vs-ward, then was among the Iewes, the

For my part, I haue here onely pointed at His Maieſties firſt entrance and acts, rather to ſhew a liberty of writing the kingdomes affaires, which neuer is permitted, ſauing vnder good Princes, then by my vnable performance to enter into that which requires the pen of ſome iudicious Tacitus, or eloquent Zenophon, and conclude with the aduiſe of Ammianus Marcellinus the famous Hiſtorian: Let other men for experience more ſufficient, and for learning better known write the reſt, whom, if it ſhall pleaſe them to enter thereupon, I aduiſe to frame their pennes vnto an higher Stile. Ammia.lib.31. cap.17

A ſummary Concluſion of the vvhole.

BY the aſſiſtance of the All-Sufficient (the onely defence and Preſeruer of man) my inſufficient abilities, haue attained the end of this worke, and my weake vnable Perſon brought to a Period this large Edifice of GREAT BRITAINS THEATRE. How acceptable to others, I know not; but with what paines and trauaile to my ſelfe, my decaied ſtrength too manifeſtly hath felt, and with what care of truth, the Authorities alleaged through the whole Proceſſe, are my witneſſes; whoſe lines haue beene the meaſures, and Antiquities the matter, that hath raiſed the Fabrick vnto this height. The attempt was great, and farre vnfit (I muſt confeſſe) for me to vndergoe; which, euen at the firſt entrance was ſo cenſured by the Iudicious, and in the continuance hath ſo proued: that now it being finiſhed, as the Silkeworme endeth her life in her long wrought clew, ſo I in this Theatre haue built my owne Graue; whoſe Architecture howſoeuer defectiue it may be ſaid to be, yet the proiect is good: and the coſt great, though my ſelfe haue freely beſtowed this paines to the Preſſe, without preſſing a penny from any mans purſe. For me to ſhew the vtilitie of Hiſtory, were to light a dimme candle before the bright Sunne; or to preſcribe a methode for their vſes, were, with Phormio to reade a Lecture of Cheualrie vnto great Hannibal, warres experienced Conductor: But, as our owne concerneth vs neereſt (wherein my pen hath taken the freeſt acceſſe) ſo let me abridge the whole in a ſmall Circle, and incompaſſe that briefly, which hath beene related in a farre wider circumference.

(2) Our Land, peopled from Iaphet the firſt ſonne of Noah, fell vnto thoſe ſonnes of Gomer, who inhabited theſe parts of Europe, whoſe iſſue were moſt famouſly knowne by the name of Britaines. At firſt, naked, rude, and ignorant of the true God; yet no ſooner were frequented with the ciuill Romanes, but that they couered their Cut-painted bodies with Garments; and ſhortly imitated them euen in their moſt ciuilized actions; yea, ſcarcely was Chriſt taken downe from his Croſſe but they became Chriſtians (the greateſt glory of any Nation) and among them the Goſpell had her firſt progreſſe by eſtabliſhed authority. Their Gouernment was vnder Kings, and thoſe of as honourable a reſpect, as were any other in theſe Weſt-parts of the World, both in training their Subiects vnto due obedience, and miniſtring of Lawes for the maintainance of eſtate. Their warres domeſticke and forraine were ſo managed with Policie and valour, as in the one they valiantly defended themſelues againſt their aſſaults, and in the other ſteeded the Romanes in moſt of their Conqueſts: which coſt them laſtly their owne ſubuerſions, when their warriers and virgins were conſumed and tranſported into other parts, whilſt their natiue Land lay expoſed to the will of Inuaders.

firſt aſſaied by Iulius Cæſar from the Coaſts of Gallia. Which his attempt was ſo honourable in eſteeme of their Emperors, that Claudius (the fifth in ſucceſſion) holding the Triumph but baſe, that attends vpon authority without action of Price, made choiſe of Britaine to adorne his triumphant Chariot, that this Iland (ſited, as was thought, in another World, and but part thereof ſhewed by Cæſar to the Romans) might adde remembrance of name to his forgetfull Perſon: and to that end, hauing made hither himſelfe, ſtamped his Conqueſt vpon his Coines thus, DE BRITANN: and vpon his aged knees crept vp the ſteps of the Capitoll, to giue thankes of victory vnto his gods on the day of his Triumph; which, though for a ſmall part of this Ilands ſubiection, was yet accompliſhed with more then ordinarie magnificence, and the ſhewes greater then vſually had beene ſeene, for the Conqueſts of farre larger and better knowne Kingdomes. And with as great a care was it kept, whilſt the Romans kept their owne greatnes. But when their high-mounted Pillar ouerſwayed her owne Baſe, and the farre-ſpread boughes were growne too weighty for the ſtemme, many hands at once graſped at the Emperiall Crowne, and all of them together tare the Branches from the Body of that faire Tree. By whom alſo the faire and flouriſhing Cedars of Britain were ſhaken, and left naked both of fruite, and leafe. So that now the glory of the one declined, and the beauty of the other vtterly defaced, and neither of them able any longer to ſupport their owne ſtandings, gaue place vnto deſtiny that would now haue both downe; whereby the Iewell ſo much deſired, and which had beene kept with ſuch care, was now laid at ſtake to them that could winne it, and Britain abandoned by the Romans, without further claime, after they had beene Lords thereof the ſpace of fiue hundred yeeres.

(4) The next Actors vpon Britaines faire Stage, were the Saxons, a people of Germany, fierce, bold and irreligious, as, for the moſt part, the reſt of Nations in thoſe daies were. Theſe infeſting with Piracies the Coaſts of Britaine and Gallia, grew both fearefull and famous in profeſſion of military ſeruices. In France they ſeized vpon the Country of * Baiocaſſes; in Germany by intruſion they vnſeated the Sueuians; in Holland and Frieſland, they incroached vpon the Batauians, and Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus (now a continent of Denmarke) they made the place of their aboad. From whence they often aſſailed the Coaſts of this Iland, euen whilſt the Romans held it for theirs, and were often put backe by Stilicho and others, whoſe praiſes the Poet Claudian chaunted aloud. But the Romans departed, and Britaine left bare of men, their land waſted by famine, tumultuous vprores, and by bandings of Great-ones who ſhould be greateſt; the Scots and Picts (ancient Enemies to their Peace) tooke the aduantage, and continually made bloody incurſions into their Land. And albeit a ſtone-wall was raiſed athwart the whole Continent, to impeach their inroades; yet that auailed little, their aſſaults were ſo great. Whereupon the Saxons were ſent for, and in their firſt ſeruice freed the Britaines from thoſe raging Picts; The Lands defence then they vndertooke, and the Inhabitants conſented to maintaine the charge; which whilſt it was in giuing was thankefully receiued, but once receiued was vngratefully forgot. And they (like the Rauens of Arabia, who ſo long as they are full, yeeld a pleaſant noiſe, but being empty make a horrible crie) emptied faſter then the Britains could fill, and euer complained they had not inough, till laſtly by ſurprize they got all into their owne clawes. Then deuided they among themſelues the beſt of the Land, and droue their Receiuers into the worſt and waſte mountaines of Wales, euery of their Captaines ſharing a part to himſelfe, and of one Emperiall Crowne made ſeauen Diadems to adorne their owne heads; which long were not worne, without inteſtine warres, each of them ſtriuing to inlarge his owne, vpon his next, till God and deſtiny againe brought all vnto One, euen to great Egbert, who forbade the Ilands old Name, and commanded theſe now vnited Prouinces to be called Anglia. Yet no ſooner was this accompliſhed, with aſſured hopes conceiued, that the Saxons glory ſhould thence forward aſcend and ſpread forth with peace, but that a ſauage nation, as fierce as the Scythians, caſt their eies of deſire vpon that beautifull Crowne, and preſently attempted, but neuer intermitted any bloody cruelties that could forward the ſame, till they had ſet it on their owne Helmets; and theſe Saxons worne out with reſiſtance, gaue place to the Danes, when time had worne out fiue hundred ſixtie three yeeres of their Gouernment.

(5) Theſe Danes thus ſucceeding (though with no better right to enioy) were a ſtout ſturdy Nation whoſe many Piracies both France and Bretaigne had many times felt, before they attained the end of this their Goale. For theſe, multiplying like Bees in the Hiue, the land of their owne natiuitie was too little for each to haue a part: vpon which occaſion a cuſtome was practiſed to baniſh ſome that the reſt might haue roome. Theſe Exiles therefore (chiefely conſiſting of their youth) fell vpon other Landes with no leſſe danger, then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, and greeuouſly wounded whereſoeuer they fell; but no where more deadly then in England. Which for two hundred and eighteene yeeres continuance, they vnceſſantly aſſaulted; ſometimes harrowing the Countrey before them, and carrying away great Booties to their Ships: ſometimes impoueriſhing the People, by exacting great ſummes of money for compoſition of Peace: ſometimes expelling the Inhabitants, and ſeating themſelues in their places: and ſometimes ſharing the Country with their Kings, and taking vnto themſelues none of the worſt; but not as other Conquerors to build, ſow, and plant, but to lay waſt, caſt downe, and deſtroy, ſparing neither Erections for ciuill vſe, nor places of Oratory dedicated to diuine. Yet the Garland once gotten by their King Canut, was worne with great glory, and by three of thoſe Daniſh Kings, Englands Crowne was enioied. The firſt of them Potent, religious, wiſe and iuſt. The ſecond, illegitimate, an vſurper very agill, but idle: And the third a Tyrant, a Taxe-raiſer, laſciuious and a glutton, in which exceſſe at Lambeth he ſuddainely ended his life, when the Land became cleared of the Danes ſore oppreſſions, after they had a long time attempted, and their Kings for fiue and twenty yeeres ſpace worne the royall diademe of this Realme.

(6) Theſe foure Nations fulfilling their times by Heauens aſſignement, in gaining, keeping, and againe looſing, the rich Garland of GREAT BRITAINES gouernment: a fift, inferiour to none, made thereunto a double claime, and by a third (more ſure then both) which was, their conquering ſword, got it. Theſe laſt (which I pray may be laſt) were the Normans, a people fierce and valorous, whoſe many Sea-aduentures were ſo great, in the daies of Charles the Great, as that he wept to foreſee the harmes they would doe to his in France, which proued ſo many that Charles the Bald (his Grand-Child) was forced to part with the Earledome of Charters vnto Haſting a Norman; Charles the Groſſe with the County Newſtria, vnto Godfrey their Chieftainer: and Charles the Simple with all the Countreys which lay betwixt the Riuer Seine and Loyre, vnto Rollo their Leader, whereof he became Duke, and that Dutchie from him named Normandy. Whence William the Baſtard the ſeuenth in diſcent, in a bloodie field at Battell in Suſſex, wan the Engliſh Crowne from King Harald that held it; when, by changing of Lawes, diſheriting of Nobles, and beſtowing the Lands Reuenewes vpon his, he laid the foundation of a glorious Monarchie. Crowne banded for, among brethren and kindred (as what will not the desire of a Diademe doe?) the two yonger brethren successiuely wearing it, to the preiudice of their * Elder, and Stephen hauing no right, but such as Intruders pretend. But Henrie Plantagenet placed on the Throne, and three hundred thirty one yeeres taken vp in the Raignes of foureteene Kings of his line, their Acts afforde matter of more Princely consequence, their Dominions spread wider, themselues being the lawfull Inheritors to the third part of France, and to the Whole by the Title of their third Edward, and by the Conquest of their fifth Henry. And surely had not the ciuill dissentions of Lancaster and Yorke spent their weapons in the woundes of themselues, those Kings and their Successours vndoubtedly had beene double crowned euen to this day. But these Roses pluckt off by dissentious hands, and their Branches torne downe in home-bred broyles, their roiall rootes lay as it were dead in the Earth, till Tyuder of Lancaster with Plantagenet of Yorke, gaue them vigor and sappe, by binding both together in wedlockes goulden band. Whereby also the long dead stemme of the auncient British Kings beganne againe to bud forth, and fiue renowned Princes of that Sirname succeeded in Englands Throne. The first of them, the richest, and wisest King of this Westerne-World; The Second, the forest wounder of the Papall authority; The third, the forwardest in all pious actions. The fourth the feruentest for the Religion of Rome; And the fifth a Mayden-Queene, the most famously renowned among the Worlds Monarkes, vnder whose raignes one hundred and sixteene yeeres were fully complete and run. And were it not that the English are taxed to be ouer-much addicted vnto vaine Propheſies, and that Merlins was prohibited by decree of Counsell, I might alledge his, and that of Aquila at Shaftesbury, both of them foreshewing that the British Empire after the Saxons and Normans, should returne againe to her auncient Stocke and Name. Notwithstanding Truth bids vs acknowledge, how farre God hath accomplished both these in the royall Person of our now-Soueraigne, the one by his discent from the loines of that Roiall Tuder King Henry the Seuenth; and the other, by his Edict, in restoring to the Iland her auncient Name, Britannia: himselfe being the first Monarch of the two Kingdomes Vnion, and the greatest of Command, since Canutus the Dane. The Cordes of whose Royall Tents, we pray, may be further extended, that those naked Virginians may be couered vnder the Curtaines of his most Christian Gouernment; and that the Scepter of his Peace may bud, as Aarons Rod in his hand, and in the hand of his Sonne, and Sonne Sonnes, so long as the Sunne and Moone endureth.

(7) These then (worthy Reader) are the Heads, whence haue issued such plentifull Springs, that now met together in one Body the Streame is grown very bigge, which thing I euer feared, but could neuer preuent; offending rather with the Niggard who thinketh euery mite too-much, then sinning with the Prodigall in superfluous excesse; so plenteous is our Story, and so largely requires it to bee writ. Through all which my weake body with many yeeres labour hath alone trauelled, aswell in the reuiewing of the Geographicall parts of the Land, as in the compiling of the succeeding Historie, though far vnable to perfect either, according to their owne worths. But lest the waight of the whole should rest vpon so slender a proppe as myselfe: I haue laid my buildings vpō far stronger arches, as by the many alleaged authorities may appeare. For first, the Chards for the most part traced by others, and most of them diuulged vnto view, were the foundations of my begunne paines; in supplying their wants with my many additions, and dimensions of the Shire-townes, and Cities true platformes. The further descriptions of sundry prouinces, I haue gleaned from the famous workes of the most worthy and learned Cambden, whose often sowed seedes in that Soile hath lastly brought forth a most plenteous harueſt. For the body of the Historie, many were the manuscripts, notes, and Records, wherewith my honored and learned friends supplied me; but none more (or so many) as did the worthy repairer of eating times ruines, the learned Sir Robert Cotten Knight Baronet, another Philadelphus in preseruing old Monuments, and ancient Records: whose Cabinets were vnlocked, and Library continually set open to my free accesse: & from whence the chiefest garnishments of this worke haue beene enlarged and brought: such as are the antique altars, & Trophies in Stone, by him preserued from perishing obliuion; The Coines of gold, siluer, alcumy, and copper, of the Britaines, Romans, Saxons, Danes, and English, with the Broade Seales of those Kings since the same were in vse: all of them so followed from the originall moddles, and moneyes, by the most exquisit and curious hand of our age, as any eye may witnes they are the true prints from those stamps. The like most acceptable helpes, both of Bookes and Collections, (especially in matters remoter from our times) I continually receiued from that worthy Diuine, Master Iohn Barkham, a gentleman composed of Learning, Vertue, & Curtesie, as being no lesse ingenuously willing, then learnedly able, to aduance and forward all vertuous endeuours. Besides, these, some other supply I haue had: for my disease growne dangerous, and life held in suspence; it behoued him who had towards the publishing bestowed so great cost, to forward the finishing; and to that end hee procured mee to his further charges an * assistant in the liues of our middle English Kings: whose Stories and raignes (by the Iudicious) may by their stiles bee knowne to bee writ with another penne. Lastly for the matters of Herauldrie, the willing and ready paines of Master William Smith, Rough Dragon, (an Officer at armes) was euer at hand: and by these hands this building is mounted to such an height as thou seest: which thus now finished, this scanted Epitome, may well serue thy foote-steppes, as staires to ascend these fiue nationall Stories alreadie finished, and leade thee into the sixth now most happilie begunne. Where from those mounted heights, thou maist behold, how Time hath squared the Stones of these buildings: how Fortune hath varied in contriuing the Worke: and how the Fates haue erected, polished, and puld downe, the supporting Pillars of GREAT BRITAINES THEATRE. From whose Tarras with Dauid cast not thy lusting eie vpon vnlawfull delights: Nor with Babels King boast, that this was built by thy owne might: But with Moses confesse that from a small stocke (as a graft of the Lords planting) thou art now growne into a great Nation, mighty, and ful of people. And with Salomon make supplication vnto thy great Iehouah, that the Arke of his strength may euer rest in this House, & his eies be euer open thereon day and night. With the Prophet pray that this building may be as beauteous as his, the Foundations laid with Saphires, her Windowes with the Emerauds, and her Gates with the Carbuncles. That the desarts of this chosen Zion may be as Eden, and her wildernes like the Garden of God. Her Gouernment Peace, her People the Saints of Saluation, & her Kings the Signets on Gods right hand, successiuely to sit on this Royall Throne, till Christ the King of Kings shall come in the Clowdes, and from the Raine-Bow the Throne of his Maiesty pronounce vs blessed, and make vs heires with himselfe of that Kingdome which neuer shall haue end. Vnto which CHRIST, with his FATHER, and HOLY SPIRIT, three in Persons but ONE GOD eternall, vndiuideable in Deity, be ascribed all Praise, Honour, Glorie, Wisdome, Power and Might for euermore. Amen.
